[liv. 198]

STERNE, LAURENCE (1713-1768), humorist and sentimentalist; great-grandson of Richard Sterne [q. v.]; born at Clonmel; the son of a subaltern in the army; after some years' wandering spent eight years at school in Halifax; left penniless; sent to Cambridge by a cousin (Richard); sizar, Jesus College, 1733, exhibitioner, 1734; matriculated, 1735; intimate with John Hall-Stevenson [q. v.]; M.A., 1740; curate of Buckden; became vicar of Sutton-in-the-Forest, 1738, and prebendary of York, 1741, also obtaining a sinecure office; married Miss Lumley, 1741; first used epithet 'sentimental' in letter, 1740; obtained, by wife's influence, Stillington, parish adjoining Sutton, 1743, being also chaplain to fourth Earl of Aboyne; interested in local private enclosure acts, 1756, 1766; dabbled in painting and music; joined in orgies of 'Demoniacks' at Hall-Stevenson's house; showed affection for his only child; troubled by his mother's demands for money; said to have let her die of starvation; published, 1750, assize sermon, inserted in 'Tristram Shandy'; satirised Yorkshire lawyer as 'Trim' in sketch first published, 1769, as 'A Political Romance addressed to —— Esq. of York' (rare), afterwards reprinted as 'History of a Warm Watch Coat'; unfaithful to his wife, who became insane, 1758; began 'Tristram Shandy,' 1759; carried on flirtation with Mademoiselle Fourmantelle; vols. i. and ii. of his 'Tristram Shandy' printed at York by publisher of sermons, 1760; taken by Croft to London, where he was well received in society; second edition of his 'Tristram' and 'Sermons of Mr. Yorick' issued by Dodsley, 1760, the latter being commended by Gray; his 'Tristram Shandy' unpopular in Yorkshire on account of its recognisable portraits of local characters, such as Dr. John Burton (1710-1771) [q. v.] ('Slop'); denounced by Dr. Johnson, Richardson, Horace Walpole, Goldsmith, and others, on moral and literary grounds; ineffectual attempts made by Warburton to restrain his obscenity; many pamphlets issued against him, 1760-1; received perpetual curacy of Coxwold, 1760; called house at Coxwold (which now has tablet) Shandy Hall; visited London to superintend publication of vols. iii. and iv. of 'Tristram,' 1761; preached at Foundling Hospital, London; vols. v. and vi. of 'Tristram' dedicated to Lord Spencer, issued for him by Becket

December 1761; went abroad for his health, January 1762; well received in Paris salons; entertained by Fox at St. Germain; joined by wife and daughter; lived at Toulouse, and, till February 1764, in the south of France; left wife and daughter behind at Montauban, by their wish; spent April–May 1764 in Paris, seeing much of Wilkes and preaching at English ambassador's chapel; published books vii. and viii. of 'Tristram,' 1765; painted by Gainsborough at Bath, 1765; began seven months' tour described in 'Sentimental Journey,' October 1765; went by Paris, Lyons, and Savoy to Italy; well received at Rome, where he met Smollett ('Smelfungus'); in Naples, February 1766; in Yorkshire again, June 1766; issued book ix. of 'Tristram Shandy,' with dedication to Chatham, containing sentence supposed to have suggested Burns's lines about the 'guinea stamp,' 1767; also published vols. iii. and iv. of 'Sermons,' Voltaire being among the subscribers; during visit to London, December 1766 to May 1767, met, at house of Sir William James [q. v.], Mrs. Eliza Draper [q. v.]; kept journal addressed to her ('The Bramine's Journal'); manuscript in British Museum), April to August 1767, after her departure for India; after two months' visit from wife and daughter at Coxwold, arranged permanent separation; parted reluctantly with daughter; his 'Sentimental Journey' issued, 1768; died of pleurisy in Old Bond Street lodgings, London; buried in St. George's cemetery, Bayswater Road, London; body said to have been 'resurrected' and sold to Charles Collignon [q. v.], the skeleton being long preserved at Cambridge; inscription on stone at St. George's erected by 'two brother masons' inaccurate; left no will, and died insolvent; wife and daughter relieved through subscriptions collected by Hall-Stevenson and Mrs. Draper, and by publication (1769) of three more volumes of sermons; publication of his letters to Mrs. Draper threatened by widow in default of blackmail; his letters published by his daughter (Madame Medalle), 1775; publication of 'Letters of Yorick to Eliza' (1766–7) authorised by Mrs. Draper, 1775. The 'Letters from Eliza to Yorick,' 1775, and 'Letters supposed to have been written by Yorick and Eliza,' 1779, are forgeries.

Among fraudulent imitations of his writings were John Carr's third volume of 'Tristram Shandy,' 1760, J. Hall-Stevenson's continuation of the 'Sentimental Journey,' 1769, and Richard Griffith's 'Posthumous Works of a late celebrated Genius,' 1770 (included in first collected edition). His works contain many literary thefts, and the general scheme of 'Tristram' closely resembles that of John Dunstan's 'A Voyage round the World . . . the rare adventures of Don Kainophilus' (1720 ?). But his style is original, and his characters are of the first class. First collective edition of 'Tristram Shandy' published, 1767, last, 1779; 'Sermons of Mr. Yorick,' first reissued collectively, 1775, last, 1787; 'Sentimental Journey' reissued with plates, 1792; first collective edition of complete works (without letters) published, 1779 (Dublin); best early edition (with letters and Hogarth's plates) published, 1780; Dr. J. P. Browne's (containing much newly recovered correspondence), 1873. The 'Sentimental Journey' has been often translated. [liv. 199]

[lv. 75]

STUART, LORD DUDLEY COUTTS (1803–1854), advocate of the independence of Poland; eighth son of first Marquis of Bute; M.A. Christ College, Cambridge, 1823; liberal M.P. for Arundel, 1830, 1831, 1833, and 1835, Marylebone, 1847–54; obtained parliamentary and charitable relief for the Polish victims; died at Stockholm, whither he had gone in the hope of persuading the king of Sweden to join western Europe in taking measures for the reconstruction of Poland. [lv. 76]

STUART, ESMÉ, sixth SEIGNEUR OF AUBIGNY and first DUKE OF LENNOX (1542?–1583), grandson of John Stewart, third or eleventh Earl of Lennox [q. v.]; sent to Scotland as agent of the Guises to overthrow Morton and restore Roman catholicism, 1579; pretended to be a convert to protestantism, and obtained the support of the kirk, which led to Morton's execution, 1581; created Duke of Lennox, 1581; proposed to lead a Spanish army to invade England, 1582; suspicion of his fidelity excited by his quarrel with Arran and rumours of the plot; obliged on James VI's seizure by the protestant nobles to leave Scotland; had an interview with Queen Elizabeth, 1583, and left for Paris, where he died. [lv. 77]

STUART or STEWART, FRANCES TERESA, DUCHESS OF RICHMOND and LENNOX (1647–1702), 'La Belle Stuart,' granddaughter of Walter Stewart or Stuart, first Lord Blantyre [q. v.]; educated in France and imbued with French tastes; remarkable for her beauty; maid of honour to Queen Catherine of Braganza; mistress of Charles II; had many lovers and aspirants; eloped from Whitehall with the third Duke of Richmond, 1667, in consequence of which Charles II, suspecting it to be the work of Clarendon, determined to disgrace the chancellor; returned to court after her marriage. She was probably the original of the figure of Britannia on the copper coinage. [lv. 80]

STUART, GILBERT (1742–1786), historian and reviewer; educated at Edinburgh; published 'Historical Dissertation on the Antiquity of the English Constitution,' 1768; writer in the 'Monthly Review,' 1768–73; brought out the 'Edinburgh Magazine and Review,' 1773, which came to an end in 1776 owing to his violence and malicious jealousy; wrote also, among other works, 'A View of Society in Europe,' 1778, and 'The History of Scotland,' 1782, composed in the Johnsonian or 'balancing style'; was one of the principal writers in the 'English Review,' 1783; attacked Robertson with great violence, imagining himself to have been injured by the historian. [lv. 82]

STUART, GILBERT (1755–1828), portrait-painter; born in Narragansett, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; came to England and worked with Benjamin West, 1775, returning, 1792; the painter of Washington. [lv. 84]

STUART, HENRY, DUKE OF GLOUCESTER (1639–1660). [See HENRY.]

STUART, HENRY WINDSOR VILLIERS (1827–1895), of Dromana; politician; was ordained, 1850, but surrendered his orders, 1873, and was returned to parliament as M.P. for Waterford, 1873–4 and 1880–5; accomplished valuable work in Egypt, 1883; his reports published in a blue-book; wrote largely on Egypt. [lv. 85]

STUART, JAMES, fourth DUKE OF LENNOX and first DUKE OF RICHMOND (1612–1655), son of Esmé, third duke of Lennox; studied at Cambridge; a staunch supporter of Charles I, but more from loyalty than devotion to his policy; granted Charles I large sums in the civil war; created Duke of Richmond, 1641. [lv. 85]

STUART, JAMES (1713–1788), painter and architect; known as 'Athenian Stuart'; originally employed in painting fans for Lewis Goupy [q. v.]; visited Rome, 1741, and Greece, 1751, with Nicholas Revett [q. v.], the result of their expedition to Greece being published in 'The Antiquities of Athens,' 1762, which led to the introduction of Greek architecture in London, Lord Anson's house in St. James's Square, built by Stuart, being perhaps the first of that style; F.R.S. and F.S.A.; architect and authority on classical art; member of the Dilettanti Society. [lv. 86]

STUART, JAMES (d. 1793), major-general; brother of Andrew Stuart [q. v.]; saw much active service from 1758 to 1775, in which latter year he entered the employment of East India Company in Madras; major-general, 1781; while attacking Cuddalore, owing to rivalry of the civil powers, was seized by the Madras government and sent home to England. [lv. 88]

STUART, JAMES (1741–1815), general; served in the American war of independence; in campaigns under Sir Eyre Coote, Sir William Medows, and Cornwallis; commanded expedition against Ceylon, which he secured, 1796; took Seringapatam, 1798; general, 1812. [lv. 89]

STUART, JAMES (1764–1842), historian of Armagh; B.A. Trinity College, Dublin, 1789; called to the Irish bar; author of 'Historical Memoirs of Armagh,' 1819; editor of newspapers and poet. [lv. 89]

STUART, JAMES (1775–1849), writer to the signet; studied at Edinburgh University; a keen whig politician, and attacked violently by the 'Beacon' and by the 'Glasgow Sentinel,' 1821; killed in a duel the writer of one of these articles, Sir Alexander Boswell, 1822, and after a trial, which excited much interest, was acquitted; after a visit to America, 1828, published 'Three Years in North America,' 1833, displaying a strong bias in favour of the Americans; inspector of factories, 1836. [lv. 90]

STUART, SIR JAMES, first baronet (1780–1853), chief-justice of Canada; solicitor-general of Lower Canada, 1801, but resigned and joined the opposition in the House of Assembly, 1809, and procured impeachment of the chief-justices Sewell and Monk; active in procuring the union of the two provinces; appointed attorney-general for Lower Canada, 1825; impeached, 1831; created baronet, 1841; chief-justice of Canada, 1841. [lv. 91]

STUART or STEWART, SIR JOHN, of Darnley, SEIGNEUR OF AUBIGNY (1365?–1429), as one of the commanders of the Scottish force helped to defeat the English at Beaugé, 1421; granted the seigneury of Aubigny, 1422. [lv. 92]

STUART, JOHN (1700?–1779), superintendent of Indian affairs; went to America with General James E. Oglethorpe, 1733, and was in Fort Loudoun during the French war, when it was besieged by the Cherokee Indians; made terms with Oconostota, who, however, treacherously massacred the garrison; general agent and superintendent of Indian affairs for the southern department, 1763; took part with the royalists in the war of independence; died in England. [Iv. 98]

STUART, JOHN, third EARL OF BUTE (1713–1792), succeeded his father as earl, 1723; educated at Eton; married Mary, only daughter of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu [q. v.], thereby acquiring eventually the Wortley estates; elected a representative peer of Scotland, 1737; took no part, however, in politics during his earlier years, but amused himself in Bute with agriculture, botany, and architecture; introduced by an accident, 1747, to Frederick, prince of Wales, at whose court his influence soon became paramount; assisted the Princess of Wales in imbuing Prince George (George III) with Bolingbroke's principles of absolute monarchy; great scandal caused by his intimate relations with the princess; on accession of George III became practically prime minister; made secretary of state, 1761; got rid of Pitt, his policy being to make peace, but notwithstanding was obliged to declare war with Spain, 1762; succeeded Newcastle as first lord of the treasury, whose retirement he effected by proposing withdrawal of the Prussian subsidy, 1762; K.G., 1762; made secret overtures for peace, and induced Henry Fox [q. v.] to accept leadership of the House of Commons, with whose aid and by bribery he carried addresses approving the terms of the preliminary treaty of Fontainebleau; lost popularity by the treaty of Paris, 1763, being even suspected (probably without foundation) of accepting bribes from France; his unpopularity increased by the cider tax, 1763; resigned, 1763; retained, with George Grenville as prime minister, George III's confidence, and intrigued against that minister, but unsuccessfully; finally retired from George III's business, May 1765; voted against the Stamp Act, 1766, and subsequently travelled abroad incognito. His ability for intrigue did not make up for his lack of administrative talent and of parliamentary experience. He was a patron of literature, giving Dr. Johnson a pension of 300*l.* a year, and a student of botany, privately printing 'Botanical Tables.' [Iv. 92]

STUART, SIR JOHN (1759–1815), lieutenant-general; son of John Stuart (1700?–1779) [q. v.]; count of Maida; born in Georgia, North America; educated at Westminster School; took part in the war against the American colonists, and was present at surrender at Yorktown, 1781; served in the unsuccessful campaign against the French, 1793–5; took part in the capture of Minorca, 1799; at the battle of Alexandria (1801) ensured the victory by his action at a critical moment; gained decisive victory over the French general Reynier in Calabria, 1806, and received pension of 1,000*l.* per annum; made K.B. and Count of Maida; took Ischia and Procida and captured Murat's gunboats, 1809, after which he retired to Messina; repulsed attack of the enemy with great loss near Messina, 1810; complained of want of support from Lord Liverpool and resigned; G.C.B., 1815. SWIFT, DEANE (1707–1783), author; cousin of Jonathan Swift [q. v.]; B.A. St. Mary Hall, Oxford, 1736; published 'An Essay upon the Life, Writings, and Character of Dr. Jonathan Swift,' 1755. [Iv. 228]

SWIFT, JONATHAN (1667–1745), dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, and satirist; cousin of Dryden and son of Jonathan Swift by Abigail (Erick) of Leicester; born at Dublin after his father's death; grandson of Thomas Swift, the well-known royalist vicar of Goodrich, who was descended from a Yorkshire family, a member of which, 'Cavaliero' Swifte, was created Baron Carlingford, 1627; educated at Kilkenny grammar school, where Congreve was a schoolfellow, and at Trinity College, Dublin, 1682; neglected his studies, showed an impatience of restraint, was publicly censured for offences against discipline, and only obtained his degree by the 'special grace'; attributed his recklessness himself to the neglect of his family, for whom he felt little regard; joined his mother at Leicester on the troubles which followed the expulsion of James II; admitted into the household of Sir William Temple, who had known his uncle Godwin, c. 1692, where he acted as his secretary; introduced to William III and sent by Temple to him, to convince him of the necessity for triennial parliaments, 1693; wrote pindarics, one being printed in the 'Athenian Mercury,' 1692, which, according to Dr. Johnson, provoked Dryden's remark, 'Cousin Swift, you will never be a poet'; chafed at his position of dependence, and was indignant at Temple's delay in procuring him preferment; left Temple's service, returned to Ireland, was ordained, 1694, and was given the small prebend of Kilroot; returned to Temple at Moor Park, 1696; read deeply, mostly classics and history, and edited Temple's correspondence; wrote (1697) 'The Battle of the Books,' which was published in 1704, together with 'The Tale of a Tub,' his famous and powerful satire of theological shams and pedantry; met 'Stella,' Esther Johnson [q. v.], who was an inmate of Temple's family at the time; went again to Ireland on the death of Temple, 1699; given a prebend in St. Patrick's, Dublin, and Laracor, with other livings; made frequent visits to Dublin and London; D.D. Dublin, 1701; wrote his 'Discourse on the Dissensions in Athens and Rome' with reference to the impeachment of the whig lords, 1701; in his visit to London, 1705 and 1707, became acquainted with Addison, Steele, Congreve, and Halifax; entrusted (1707) with a mission to obtain the grant of Queen Anne's bounty for Ireland; wrote some pamphlets on religious or church subjects; published 'Letter on the Sacramental Test,' 1708, an attack on the Irish presbyterians, which, though anonymous, injured him with the whigs; in disgust at the whig alliance with dissent, ultimately went over to the tories on his next visit to England, 1710; attacked the whig ministers in pamphlets, in the 'Examiner,' November 1710 to June 1711, and wrote the 'Conduct of the Allies,' 1711; became dean of St. Patrick's, 1713; had already commenced the 'Journal to Stella,' had become intimate with the tory ministers, and had used his influence in helping young and impoverished authors, including Pope and Steele; returned to England, 1713, to reconcile Bolingbroke and Harley, but in vain; wrote more pamphlets, notably 'The Public Spirit of the Whigs considered,' 1714, in reply to Steele's 'Crisis,' but at length gave up all for lost and retired to the country; left for Ireland, 1715, after the fall of the ministry and the death of Queen Anne; his marriage to Stella, an incident which still remains unproven, and also his final rupture with 'Vanessa' (Miss Vanhomrigh, whose acquaintance he had made in London), supposed to have taken place about this time; his rupture with Vanessa the cause of her death, before which she entrusted to her executors his poem 'Cadenus and Vanessa,' which relates the story of their love affair; though always contemptuous of the Irish, was led, by his personal antipathies to the whigs, to acquire a sense of their unfair dealings with Ireland; successfully prevented the introduction of 'Wood's Halfpence' into Ireland by his famous 'Drapier Letters,' 1724; came to England, 1726, visited Pope and Gay, and dined with Walpole, for whose behoof he afterwards wrote a letter complaining of the treatment of Ireland, which had, however, no effect on the minister; broke with Walpole in consequence; was introduced to Queen Caroline, but gained nothing by it; published 'Gulliver's Travels,' 1726; made his last visit to England, 1727, when the death of George I created for a moment hopes of dislodging Walpole; wrote some of his most famous tracts and some of his most characteristic poems during these last years in Ireland; kept up his correspondence with Bolingbroke, Pope, Gay, and Arbuthnot, and though remaining aloof from Dublin society, maintained good relations with Lord Carteret, the lord-lieutenant; attracted to himself a small circle of friends, and was adored by the people; set up a monument to Schomberg in the cathedral at his own expense, spent a third of his income on charities, and saved up another third to found a charitable institution at his death, St. Patrick's Hospital (opened, 1757); symptoms of the illness from which he appears to have suffered all his life very marked, c. 1738; buried by the side of Stella, in St. Patrick's, Dublin, his own famous inscription, 'ubi sæva indignatio ulterius cor lacerare nequit,' being inscribed on his tomb. Dr. Johnson, Macaulay, and Thackeray, among many other writers, were alienated by his ferocity, which was, however, the result of noble qualities soured by hard experience. His indignation at oppression and unfairness was genuine. His political writings are founded on common sense pure and simple, and he had no party bias. His works, with the exception of the letter upon the correction of the language, 1712, were all anonymous, and for only one, 'Gulliver's Travels,' did he receive any payment (200*l.*). A large number of publications appear to have been attributed to him by different editors without sufficient authority. [Iv. 204]

SWIFT, ROBERT (1534 ?–1599), chancellor of Durham; of the same family as Jonathan Swift [q. v.]; B.A. St. John's College, Cambridge, 1553; fellow; chancellor of Durham, 1561. [Iv. 227]

She built, besides Chatsworth (not the present building), Hardwick Hall, and many other houses. [lv. 309]

TALBOT, FRANCIS, fifth Earl of Shrewsbury (1500–1560), second son of George Talbot, fourth earl of Shrewsbury [q. v.]; accompanied Henry VIII to Calais, 1522, and assisted his father in suppressing the Pilgrimage of Grace, 1536–7; made president of the council of the north; took part in the proceedings against Seymour and Somerset; acquiesced in Northumberland's rule, but welcomed the accession of Queen Mary. [lv. 311]

TALBOT, GEORGE, fourth Earl of Shrewsbury and Earl of Waterford (1468–1538), son of John Talbot, third earl of Shrewsbury; K.G., 1488; appointed to several offices of state by Henry VIII; ambassador to Pope Julius II, 1511, and to Ferdinand of Arragon, 1512, to conclude alliance against France; commanded division in France, 1513; present at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, 1520; suppressed the northern rebellion, 1536; received grants of monastery lands [lv. 313]

TALBOT, GEORGE, sixth Earl of Shrewsbury (1528?–1590), elder son of Francis Talbot, fifth earl of Shrewsbury [q. v.]; took part in Somerset's invasion of Scotland; married 'Bess of Hardwick' [see Talbot, Elizabeth], 1568, and was chosen by Queen Elizabeth keeper of Mary Queen of Scots, who remained his ward at Tutbury, Chatsworth, Sheffield Castle, and other of his country places, 1569–84; much trusted by Queen Elizabeth. [lv. 314]

TALBOT, GILBERT de, first Baron Talbot (1277?–1346), took part in Edward I's expedition into Scotland, 1293; took up arms against the Despensers and was captured at Boroughbridge, 1322; justice of South Wales. [lv. 316]

TALBOT, GILBERT, seventh Earl of Shrewsbury (1553–1616), second son of George Talbot, sixth earl of Shrewsbury [q. v.]; married Mary Cavendish, daughter of 'Bess of Hardwick' [see Talbot, Elizabeth], who had married his father; joined in 'Bess of Hardwick's' intrigues against his father; on his father's death quarrelled with various members of the family and his tenantry; arrested by order of Queen Elizabeth, 1595, but sent to invest Henri IV with the Garter, 1596. [lv. 317]

TALBOT, JAMES, first Baron Talbot de Malahide in the peerage of the United Kingdom, 1856 (1805–1883), son of James Talbot, third baron in the Irish peerage; M.A. Trinity College, Cambridge, 1830; lord-in-waiting, 1863–6; president, Archæological Society, 1863–1883, and Royal Irish Academy; F.R.S. and F.S.A., 1858. [lv. 318]

TALBOT, JOHN, first Earl of Shrewsbury (1388?–1453), second son of Richard Talbot, fourth Baron Talbot; summoned to parliament in right of his wife as Lord Furnivall or Lord Talbot of Hallamshire, 1409–21; deputy-constable of Montgomery Castle; assisted in capture of Harlech Castle, 1409; imprisoned by Henry V on suspicion of lollard tendencies, 1413, but soon released and made lieutenant of Ireland, 1414; present at the sieges of Melun, 1420, and Meaux, 1421; fought at Verneuil, and won the Garter, 1424; surprised and reduced a number of Irish chiefs, 1424; accompanied Bedford to France, 1427, and after much fighting was made governor of Anjou and Maine and of Falaise; present at the siege of Orleans, 1429; taken prisoner at battle near Patay, remaining captive till 1431; performed many brilliant services in France, including the reconquest of the pays de Caux, the capture of Ivry, and the capture of Harfleur; made constable of France and Earl of Salop, 1422; sent again to govern Ireland, 1455, and created Earl of Waterford; sent to assist Somerset in Normandy, 1448; on the capitulation of Rouen remained as a hostage for the surrender of Harfleur; finally despatched on an expedition to Aquitaine; took Bordeaux and the whole Bordelais, but was defeated and slain at Castillon. He owed his reputation mainly to his dash and daring. [lv. 319]

TALBOT, JOHN, second Earl of Shrewsbury (1413?–1460), son of John Talbot, first earl of Shrewsbury [q. v.]; served in France, 1434 and 1442; chancellor of Ireland, 1446; treasurer of England, 1456; chief butler, 1458; killed fighting on Henry VI's side at Northampton. [lv. 323]

TALFOURD, SIR THOMAS NOON (1795–1854), judge and author; educated at Mill Hill dissenting school, and at Reading under Richard Valpy [q. v.]; read law with Joseph Chitty the elder [q. v.]; published 'Poems on various Subjects,' 1811; contributed to the 'Pamphleteer,' the 'New Monthly Magazine,' and the 'Retrospective Review,' especially articles of dramatic criticism, and made acquaintance of Lamb, Wordsworth, and Coleridge; joined the Oxford circuit and became 'Times' reporter; made serjeant, 1833, and justice of the common pleas, 1849; M.P., Reading, 1835, 1837, and 1841; introduced the Custody of Infants Bill and Copyright Bill; best known for his tragedy 'Ion,' 1835, a drama conceived in the Greek spirit. Amongst his other publications may be noticed his 'Letters' (1837) and 'Memorials' (1848) of Lamb, and his articles on Lord Eldon and Lord Stowell in the 'Quarterly Review,' December 1844. [lv. 343]

TALHAIARN (1810–1869). [See JONES, JOHN.]

TALIESIN (fl. 550), British bard; perhaps a mythic personage; first mentioned in the 'Saxon Genealogies' appended to the 'Historia Britonum,' c. 690. A mass of poetry, probably of later date, has been ascribed to him, and legends told concerning him, printed as 'Hanes Taliesin' in the 'Cambrian Quarterly Magazine' for 1833. The village of Taliesin in Cardiganshire has sprung up near the supposed site of his grave. The 'Book of Taliesin,' fourteenth century, is a collection of poems by different authors and of different dates. [lv. 346]

TALLENTS, FRANCIS (1619–1708), ejected divine; fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge; received presbyterian ordination, 1648; curate of St. Mary's, Shrewsbury, 1653; ejected, 1662; after Monmouth's rebellion confined in Chester Castle, 1685; presented purse of gold to James II in recognition of the indulgence, 1686; author of sermons and controversial religious works. [lv. 347]

TALLIS, THOMAS (1510?–1585), musician; organist at Waltham Abbey, 1540; granted half the lease of the manor of Minster in Thanet by Queen Mary, 1557; with William Byrd [q. v.] was given, by Queen Elizabeth, a monopoly of music-printing for twenty-one years, 1576; buried in Greenwich parish church, since pulled down. During life some five of his anthems were published in Day's 'Certayne Notes,' 1560, and he composed eight tunes for Archbishop Parker's 'Psalter,' 1567, and a ninth, intended for 'Veni Creator Spiritus.' Others were published in Barnard's 'Selected Church Musick,' 1641,

Lowe's 'Short Directions for Cathedral Service,' 1661, Bryce's 'Cathedral Music,' 1760 and 1763, and in other collections, but many of his works remain in manuscript. He excelled in his sacred vocal compositions; he was one of the first to compose settings of the Anglican 'service.' He represents the reaction from the excessive complications usual in his day, his litany is 'one of the finest pieces of ancient church music extant,' and the responses and some of his hymn-tunes, including 'Glory to Thee, my God, this Night,' are in general use, while his seven-voiced 'Miserere' is a 'masterpiece of speculative art' (RITTER). [lv. 348]

TALMAN, JOHN (d. 1726), amateur artist; son of William Talman [q. v.]; first director of the Society of Antiquaries, 1718. [lv. 351]

M.A. jure natalium, Cambridge, 1806; succeeded to the peerage, 1802; tory M.P. for Newport, Isle of Wight, 1807; lord of the admiralty in the Portland ministry, when he made his first speech (vindicating diplomatic secrecy), 1808; refused seat in the cabinet offered by Perceval, but accepted secretaryship-at-war, 1809; retained secretaryship through successive administrations till 1828, showing energy in carrying out reforms and maintaining his rights; wounded by a would-be assassin, 1818; elected M.P. for Cambridge University, 1811–31, when he was rejected through his support of parliamentary reform; for Bletchingley, 1831, South Hampshire, 1832, and Tiverton, 1835–65; offered by Canning chancellorship of the exchequer, but excluded from that office by George IV, 1827; remained, however, a Canningite all his life; continued in Goderich's and in Wellington's ministries, but left with the Canningites, 1828; made his first great speech on foreign affairs, attacking the government's policy towards Portugal and Greece, 1829, and supported catholic emancipation; became foreign secretary in Lord Grey's administration, 1830, which office, except during Peel's administration for four months, he held during eleven years; effected the independence of Belgium in spite of great difficulties, and prevented acceptance of the Belgian throne by the Duc de Nemours, 1830–1; obtained the Volo to Arta frontier for Greece, 1832; G.C.B., 1832; supported Isabella in Spain and Donna Maria in Portugal against the pretenders, Don Carlos and Dom Miguel, by his quadruple alliance, 1834, and sent troops to Spain; supported Turkey, in whose regeneration he believed, against the encroachments of Russia, but failed to prevent the treaty of Unkiar Skelesi between Russia and Turkey, 1833, and was obliged by French patronage of Mohammed Ali to make a treaty with Russia, Austria, and Prussia to defend Turkish territory against the Egyptians, 1840; opposed by the cabinet and court, threatened his resignation; baffled Mohammed Ali and concluded a convention closing the Bosphorus and Dardanelles to ships of all nations, 1841; declared war against China, annexed Hongkong, and obtained opening of five ports, 1840–1; effected slave trade convention, 1841; showed great prescience and firmness throughout, and raised English prestige abroad; 'had created Belgium, saved Portugal and Spain from absolutism, rescued Turkey from Russia, and the highway to India from France,' and had maintained peace; attacked in opposition, 1841–6, the 'imbecility' and 'sacrifices' of the government; became foreign secretary again in Lord John Russell's administration, 1846; preserved Swiss independence from Austrian and French interference; refused further support of England to the Orleanist dynasty, owing to the Spanish marriages, 1846; sent a fleet to re-establish the queen of Portugal, 1846; maintained attitude of neutrality through the revolution period, desiring the establishment of a stable government in France and Italian independence; through a dictatorial letter to Spain caused the English minister's dismissal from Madrid, 1848; allowed Woolwich to furnish arms to the Sicilian insurgents; procured better terms for Sardinia by his intercession, 1849; expressed England's 'disgust' at Austrian severities, and supported Turkey, at the risk of war, in her refusal to give up to Russia and Austria Polish and Hungarian refugees, 1849; compelled Greece to accept his terms in the Pacifico affair and blockaded the Piræus, 1850, on which occasion he made his famous 'civis Romanus' speech, and defeated the foreign and English conspiracies to overthrow him; brought upon himself by his independent action as foreign minister Queen Victoria's memorandum of 12 Aug. 1850, and having expressed his approval of Napoleon's coup d'état, 1851, was dismissed by Lord John Russell; the government itself defeated on an amendment moved by him shortly afterwards; refused to join, but supported Lord Derby's government; on its fall became home secretary in Lord Aberdeen's ministry, 1852; resigned on the question of reform, but returned to office, 1853; advocated in vain vigorous action in resisting Russia; on the outbreak of war proposed the Crimean campaign; the conduct of the war refused him by Aberdeen, on which Russell resigned, and the ministry fell, 1855; became prime minister at a time of immense difficulty and danger; compelled by France and Austria to agree to the treaty of Paris (1856), by which, however, the integrity of Turkey was guaranteed; K.G., 1856; opposed French projects for partition of Turkish territories in Africa; opposed the construction of the Suez Canal; defeated on the China war question, but returned to power again with increased majority at general election, 1857; underrated at first seriousness of Indian mutiny, but took prompt measures for relief of English garrisons; was defeated on the Conspiracy to Murder Bill, 1858, and resigned, but again became prime minister, 1859; supported advance of Italy towards independence; strengthened the national defences; warden of the Cinque ports, 1861; lord rector of Glasgow University, 1863; hon. D.C.L. Oxford, 1862, and LL.D. Cambridge, 1864; maintained neutrality during the American civil war, but on seizure of passengers on a British steamer sent guards to Canada, while the escape of the Alabama from Birkenhead was caused by the hesitation of the law officers; attempted in vain to protect the Poles, 1863, and Denmark from Austria and Prussia; buried in Westminster Abbey. [lvi. 16]

TEMPLE, JAMES (fl. 1640–1668), regicide; served in the parliamentary army; commissioner for the sequestration of delinquents' estates, 1643; M.P. for Bramber in the Long parliament, 1645; governor of Tilbury fort, 1649; one of Charles I's judges, signing the death-warrant, 1649; was excepted from the act of oblivion, 1660; arrested and tried, but adducing evidence of services to the royalists escaped execution. [lvi. 33]

VICKRIS, RICHARD (d. 1700), quaker; son of a Bristol merchant; visited France; prosecuted for recusancy, 1680; wrote pamphlets in defence of quakerism. [lviii. 301]

VICTOR, BENJAMIN (d. 1778), theatrical manager; originally a London barber; tradesman in Norwich, 1722; linendraper in London; deputy-manager of a Dublin theatre, 1746–59; treasurer of Drury Lane, London, 1760–78; poet-laureate of Ireland, 1755; published pamphlets and wretched verse, 1722–76, memoirs of Barton Booth, 1733, and a history (covering 1710 to 1771) of the stage in London and Dublin, 1761–71. [lviii. 302]

VICTOR, FERDINAND FRANZ EUGEN GUSTAF ADOLF CONSTANTIN FRIEDRICH OF HOHENLOHE-LANGENBURG, PRINCE, for many years known as COUNT GLEICHEN (1833–1891), admiral and sculptor; third and youngest son of Prince Ernest of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, and of Princess Féodore, daughter of Ernest Charles, reigning prince of Leiningen, by Princess Victoria of Saxe-Coburg-Saalfeld, afterwards Duchess of Kent; his mother was thus half-sister to Queen Victoria; midshipman in British navy, 1848; flag-lieutenant to Sir Harry Keppel in China, 1856; retired on half-pay owing to ill-health, 1866; K.C.B. and governor and constable of Windsor Castle, 1867; married, 1861, Laura Williamina, daughter of Admiral Sir George Francis Seymour [q. v.], and assumed title of Count Gleichen; devoted himself successfully to sculpture; G.C.B. and admiral, 1887.

[Suppl. iii. 388]

VICTORIA, QUEEN OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, and EMPRESS OF INDIA (1819–1901), granddaughter of George III, and only child of George III's fourth son, Edward Augustus, duke of Kent (d. 1820), by Mary Louisa Victoria, fourth daughter and youngest child of Francis Frederick Antony (1750–1806), reigning duke of Saxe-Coburg-Saalfeld (afterwards Gotha), and widow of Ernest Charles, reigning prince of Leiningen (d. 1814), was born at Kensington Palace, 24 May 1819. She was baptised, 24 June, Alexandrina Victoria, the first name being after Alexander I, czar of Russia, who was one of her sponsors. She lived from 1820 with the Duchess of Kent at Kensington Palace. Her early education was undertaken by Fräulein Louise Lehzen (created Hanoverian baroness, 1827), and, from 1827, by the Rev. George Davys, and many tutors and mistresses who worked under his supervision. Music and art were favourite studies. In 1830 the Duchess of Northumberland was appointed her governess. From 1832 onwards the Duchess of Kent and the princess made extended tours in England. She was confirmed at Chapel Royal, St. James's, 1835, celebrated her coming of age, 24 May 1837, and on 20 June 1837 succeeded to the throne, on the death of her uncle, William IV. The queen met her first privy council on the day of the king's death, and she was formally proclaimed on the following day. On her accession the union between England and Hanover, which had existed since 1714, was dissolved. She was instructed in the duties of her station by Lord Melbourne, the prime minister and leader of the whig party, who also undertook the duties of private secretary for all public business. Melbourne thus became the queen's constant companion. In private matters the Baroness Lehzen continued to fill till 1842 the secretarial office for private business, which she had filled before the queen's accession. Baron Stockmar, who had been sent by King Leopold to direct the princess's political education as soon as she reached her majority, was also in attendance on her. On 13 July she took up her official residence in Buckingham Palace. On 20 Nov. she opened her first parliament, reading her own speech, as was her custom until her widowhood, whenever she attended in person. Parliament granted her an annuity of 385,000*l.* She had in addition the revenues of the duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall (about 27,500*l.* annually); the duchy of Cornwall, which passed to the Prince of Wales at his birth in 1841, ultimately produced more than 66,000*l.*, while the yearly income from the duchy of Lancaster rose to more than 60,000*l.* In 1839 the queen discharged the debts of her father, the late Duke of Kent. The coronation took place on 28 June, 1838. In the early months of 1839 the queen was subjected to much unfavourable comment owing to her passive attitude towards Lady Flora Hastings [q. v.], daughter of the Marquis of Hastings, who was lady-in-waiting to the Duchess of Kent at Buckingham Palace, and was improperly suspected by some of the queen's attendants of immoral conduct. In the same year, 1839, Melbourne's whig ministry resigned and the queen commissioned Sir Robert Peel, the leader of the conservative opposition in the lower house, to form a government. Peel, in consultation with his friends, decided that the ladies holding the higher posts in the queen's household must be displaced if the conservative ministers were to receive adequate support from the crown. The queen, misunderstanding Peel's intentions, refused to accept his proposals. He accordingly declined to proceed to the formation of a government, and the whigs returned to office. In October 1839 the queen's first cousins, Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, and his elder brother Ernest, who had already stayed at Kensington in 1836, visited Windsor, and on 15 Oct. the queen offered Prince Albert marriage. The marriage took place on 10 Feb. 1840. Prince Albert received a grant from parliament of 30,000*l.* annually, and the queen gave him, by royal warrant, precedence next after herself. The first attempt on the queen's life was made, 10 June, 1840, by Edward Oxford, a potboy, who was found to be insane. The queen's first child, Victoria Adelaide Mary Louisa, was born on 21 Nov. 1840. In 1841 the queen came for the first time into conflict with Palmerston, the foreign minister, whose Eastern policy seemed likely to bring about a war between England and France. In June 1841 parliament was dissolved and the ensuing election produced a tory majority. Melbourne resigned and Peel was called upon to form a ministry. On 9 Nov. 1841, the queen's second child, Albert Edward, prince of Wales (now Edward VII), was born. In June 1842 the queen made her first railway journey, travelling from Slough to Paddington. On 30 May and 3 July second and third attempts on her life were made by John Francis and John William Bean. In the autumn of this year the queen paid her first visit to Scotland, journeying by sea from Woolwich to Granton. Princess Alice was born on 25 April 1843. In September the queen visited Louis-Philippe at Château d'Eu, near Tréport. This was the first occasion on which the queen had trodden foreign soil, and the first occasion on which an English sovereign had visited a French sovereign since Henry VIII appeared on the Field of the Cloth of Gold at the invitation of Francis I in 1520. Prince Alfred was born 6 Aug. 1844. Louis-Philippe returned the queen's visit in October 1844, this being the first time that a French monarch voluntarily landed on English shores. The queen opened the new Royal Exchange, London, 28 Oct. 1844. In the autumn of 1845 she visited Germany for the first time, and stayed at Rosenau, Prince Albert's birthplace. In 1845 the state of agricultural distress which prevailed throughout the United Kingdom forced Peel to advocate the repeal of the corn laws, a step which he and his party were pledged to oppose. The queen firmly supported him, but Peel deemed it just that the opposite party, which had lately championed the reform, should carry it out. He accordingly resigned, and the queen sent for Lord John Russell. Russell, however, was unable to face difficulties chiefly arising from the distrust in which Palmerston was held by the queen and many members of his own party. Peel resumed power, and on 26 June 1846 the corn-law bill passed its third reading in the Lords, but on the same night the government was defeated on the second reading of a coercion bill for Ireland, and Peel's resignation followed. Lord John Russell formed a new ministry, and the queen, with much misgiving, agreed to Palmerston's return to the foreign office. In the meantime the Princess Helena was born, 25 May 1846.

In 1844 the queen had purchased the estate of Osborne, in the Isle of Wight; the foundations of her palace there were laid in 1845, and the whole was completed, 1851. In 1848 the queen leased Balmoral House, and purchased it in 1852, when Balmoral Castle was begun; it was finished in 1854. Here a part of every spring and autumn was spent during the rest of the queen's life. In June 1849 the queen made her first visit to Ireland, going by sea from Cowes to the Cove of Cork, on which she bestowed the name of Queenstown. Subsequently she stayed four days in Dublin. Her third son, Arthur, was born on 1 May 1850.

Meanwhile the breach between the foreign minister, Palmerston, and the crown had been growing wider, and in 1850 the queen was compelled to state definitely her demands in regard to his future conduct. She required, firstly, that he should inform her distinctly of his proposed course of action in any given case, and, secondly, that he should not arbitrarily modify or alter any measure which had once received her sanction. Palmerston affected pained surprise; but his method of procedure underwent no permanent change. In February 1851 the government was outvoted on a question of electoral reform, and Lord John Russell resigned. The conservative leader, Lord Stanley, afterwards Lord Derby, declined to form a government, and Russell was recalled. In this year the queen threw herself with great spirit into the arrangements connected with the Great Exhibition. The removal of Palmerston from the ministry followed at the end of this year, and was a source of relief to the queen. On 2 Dec. Prince Louis Napoleon, by a coup d'état, made himself absolute head of the French government. The queen and Lord John viewed with detestation Napoleon's accession to power and the means of its accomplishment. Palmerston, however, expressed his approbation to the French ambassador Walewski, without communicating either with the queen or with his colleagues. Lord John, who proposed that for the present England should extend to Napoleon the coldest neutrality, summarily demanded Palmerston's resignation. The seals of the foreign office were accordingly transferred to the queen's friend, Lord Granville. Early in 1852 a militia bill occasioned the defeat and consequent resignation of the ministry. Lord Derby formed a conservative government, with Disraeli as chancellor of the exchequer and leader of the House of Commons. A general election in July left the conservatives in the minority. The Duke of Wellington died on 14 Sept. In December Disraeli's budget was rejected by a small majority, and Lord Derby resigned. A coalition ministry of conservatives and liberals was formed by the queen's wish by Lord Aberdeen, the foreign and home offices being taken respectively by Clarendon and Palmerston.

An alliance between England and France became inevitable late in 1853, owing to the position of affairs in eastern Europe. In the autumn Russia pushed her claims to protect the Greek Christians of the Turkish empire with such violence as to extort from Turkey a declaration of war. British popular opinion demanded the immediate intervention of England in behalf of Turkey. Napoleon offered to join his army with that of England, and the king of Sardinia promised to follow his example. But other foreign sovereigns endeavoured privately to influence the queen in favour of peace. Her attitude to all her continental correspondents was irreproachable, but the rumour spread that she and her husband were employing their foreign intimacies against the country's interest; and as the winter of 1853–4 progressed without any signs of decisive action on the part of the English government, popular indignation burst in its fullest fury on the head of Prince Albert. The tide of abuse was temporarily checked when, 27 Feb. 1854, the queen announced in the House of Lords the breakdown of negotiations with Russia. War was formally declared next day, and France and Sardinia renewed their promises of alliance. The queen evinced great personal interest in the progress of the Crimean war, and initiated or supported all manner of voluntary measures for the comfort of the troops. In January 1855 the government was defeated on a hostile motion for inquiry into the management of the war, and the queen reluctantly bade Palmerston form an administration; subsequently, however, she gave him her full confidence, and when the treaty of peace was signed, 30 March 1856, she acknowledged that the successful issue of the war was mainly due to him. In April 1855 the Emperor Napoleon visited the queen at Windsor, and was dissuaded from his intention of taking command in person of the French troops in the Crimea. In May the queen distributed with her own hands war medals to the returned soldiers, a function that had not previously been performed by sovereigns. In August the queen and Prince Albert visited the emperor at Paris; this was the first occasion on which an English sovereign had entered the French capital since the infant Henry VI went to be crowned in 1422. In June 1856 the queen instituted the Victoria Cross for acts of conspicuous valour in war, and herself decorated the first recipients on 26 June 1857. On 25 June 1857 the queen conferred on Prince Albert the title of prince consort. During this year (1857) the progress of the Indian mutiny caused the queen acute distress. In February Palmerston resigned on the defeat of a bill making conspiracy to murder, hitherto a misdemeanor, a felony; this had been introduced in consequence of a plot hatched in England to destroy the emperor and empress of the French by an explosive bomb which was thrown in the Opera House in Paris. Lord Derby formed a new ministry. In August the queen visited Napoleon at Cherbourg, and afterwards made an extended tour in Germany. On 25 Jan. 1858 her eldest daughter, the princess royal, married Prince Frederick, afterwards Crown Prince of Prussia. While the Indian mutiny was in course of suppression the East India Company was abolished, its territories and powers transferred to the crown, and the administration placed in the hands of the secretary of state, who was assisted by a council of fifteen. The scheme for the actual reorganisation of the Indian government, in which the queen was deeply interested, received the royal assent, 2 Aug. 1858. The queen's tranquillity of mind was at this time greatly disturbed by the part Napoleon was playing in European politics. He had threatened to join the king of Sardinia in an endeavour to expel Austria from Lombardy and Venetia. The prospect of war between France and Austria gave the queen peculiar anxiety owing to Austria's proximity to Prussia, with whose reigning house her daughter had recently become allied by marriage. Austria took the initiative by declaring war on Sardinia, and Napoleon immediately entered the field in behalf of Sardinia. The queen was successful in dissuading Prussia from interference. The prompt triumph of French arms brought hostilities to a close, but the queen's fears of the sequel were increased by a change of ministry, which brought Palmerston into power as premier, and Russell as foreign secretary. Palmerston and Russell agreed in a resolve to serve the interests of Italy at the expense of Austria. The queen, however, contrived to persuade her ministers to adopt a policy of strict neutrality. In May 1859 a volunteer force was called into existence, and in July 1860 the queen personally inaugurated the National Rifle Association as a complement to the volunteer movement; in the same year she instituted the queen's prize (250*l.*), which was thenceforth awarded annually. In September 1860 the queen and prince consort made a second journey to Coburg to visit Stockmar, who had lived there in retirement since 1857. On 4 Feb. 1861 the queen opened parliament in person; this was the last occasion in which she delivered with her own voice the speech from the throne. On 16 March the queen's mother died at Frogmore after a brief illness. In the later months of this year the health of the prince consort gradually failed. Early in December he persuaded the British ministers to adopt a conciliatory attitude towards the United States respecting the Trent affair, and on 14 Dec. he died.

The sense of desolation which the queen experienced on her husband's death never wholly left her. She long remained in retirement, and never ceased to wear mourning for him. In the two years that followed her bereavement she lived in complete seclusion, but engaged assiduously in official work. General the Hon. Charles Grey, a younger son of the second Earl Grey, who had been since 1846 private secretary to the prince consort, was appointed to the same post in the queen's service, and continued in this capacity until his death in 1870. His place was then taken by General Sir Henry Ponsonby, who died in 1895, and was succeeded by Colonel Sir Arthur Bigge, who survived the queen. On 1 July 1862 the queen attended, in deep mourning, the marriage of Princess Alice to Prince Louis of Hesse. At the close of this year it was proposed to confer the crown of Greece upon her second son, Prince Alfred. The offer caused her much perplexity. The crown was finally given to George, son of Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glucksburg (who became king of Denmark on 15 Nov. 1863); he was brother of the affianced bride of the Prince of Wales. The marriage of the Prince of Wales took place, 10 March 1863. The queen visited Germany in the autumn, and while at Coburg had an interview with the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, who was returning from Frankfurt, where a conference of German sovereigns had been held to consider a form of confederation of the German states, which seemed likely to exclude Prussia. The queen endeavoured to influence the emperor of Austria in behalf of Prussia. Towards the close of 1863 the queen gave close attention to the struggle brought about by the conflicting claims of Germany and Denmark to the duchies of Schleswig-Holstein. Her sympathies were with Germany, while those of her ministers and people were with the Danes. In February 1864 hostilities broke out between Austria and Prussia on the one hand and Denmark on the other. The Danes were promptly defeated. The queen succeeded in enforcing on her government a policy of strict neutrality. In June the German allies occupied the disputed duchies.

Meanwhile a feeling had been growing throughout the country that the queen's prolonged seclusion was contrary to the nation's interest. She replied guardedly to the popular outcry in a letter to 'The Times' newspaper (1864), stating her desire to meet the wishes of her subjects so far as her health, strength, and spirits might allow. The queen was acutely distressed at the deaths of Palmerston on 18 Oct. 1865, and of King Leopold on 10 Dec. Palmerston's place as prime minister was taken by Lord John Russell. On 10 Feb. 1866 the queen opened parliament in person. Later in the year the disputes between Prussia and Austria in regard to the final allotment of the conquered duchies of Schleswig-Holstein culminated in a desperate conflict between the two powers. The struggle hopelessly divided the queen's family in Germany. The queen bade Lord Russell take every step to prevent war. In June war was declared, and the queen's perplexity was increased by the defeat and subsequent resignation of Russell's government on the question of reform of the franchise. Russell retired from public life; he died 4 June 1878. In July the conservative leader, Lord Derby, formed a new ministry, with Disraeli as chancellor of the exchequer and leader of the House of Commons. Prussia's triumph in the war was quickly assured; Hanover was converted into a Prussian province, and by the victory at Sadowa, near Königgrätz (3 July 1866), Prussia was finally placed at the head of the whole of north Germany, and Austria was compelled to retire from the German confederation.

With the object of perpetuating her husband's memory, the queen published in 1867 a minute account of the early years of the prince consort, which had been prepared under her direction by her private secretary, General Grey. In 1870 she entrusted the continuation of this biography to (Sir) Theodore Martin; this work appeared in five volumes, 1874–80. The queen's 'Leaves from a Journal of our Life in the Highlands, 1848–61,' appeared privately in 1867, and publicly in 1868. A second part, 'More Leaves,' followed in 1883, covering the years 1862–82.

In February 1867 the queen opened parliament in person. In May of the same year she laid the foundation of the Royal Albert Hall, which was erected in her husband's memory. In this year she encouraged the government to settle the question of franchise, and Disraeli's reform bill passed through parliament. In July 1867 the queen received visits from the khedive of Egypt and the sultan of Turkey. In February 1868 Disraeli became prime minister in succession to Lord Derby. In April Gladstone brought forward his first and main resolution in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish church. The government resisted him and was defeated, and Disraeli tendered his resignation. On 5 May Disraeli announced in parliament that the queen had decided, on her own responsibility, to reject his resignation, and to dissolve parliament as soon as the arrangements for appeal to the electors, newly enfranchised under the reform bill, were complete. Disraeli's action in giving the queen the choice of two alternatives excited hostile comment. In August she paid her first visit to Switzerland, travelling incognito under the name of the Countess of Kent. In a general election at the close of this year Disraeli's government was defeated. In December Gladstone became prime minister. The first measure which he introduced was the bill for the disestablishment of the Irish church, and despite her disapproval of it the queen recognised that its adoption was inevitable. Accordingly she exerted, through Archbishop Tait, her influence against the opposition of the House of Lords, and the bill was passed (June 1869).

In 1870 the queen watched with close attention the struggle between France and Germany, and when, in 1870, Napoleon declared war, she regarded his action as wholly unjustified. On his overthrow, however, she welcomed the Empress Eugénie to England, and when the emperor joined the empress at Chislehurst, 1871, the queen extended to him a sympathy which continued until his death, 9 Jan. 1873. In 1870 Cardwell, the secretary for war, instituted a scheme for the reorganisation of the army, and on 28 June, with some reluctance, the queen signed an order in council deposing the commander-in-chief from his place of sole and immediate dependence on the crown. Later in the year her ministers caused her prerogative to be exercised in order to circumvent the opposition of the House of Lords to a bill passed in the House of Commons for the abolition of military promotion by purchase. She opened parliament in person, February 1871. On 21 March Princess Louise was married to the Marquis of Lorne, eldest son of the Duke of Argyll; this was the first time in English history that the sovereign sanctioned the union of a princess with one who was not a member of a reigning house since Mary, sister of Henry VIII, married, in 1515, Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk. During this period much anti-royalist feeling was fostered in certain classes of the community in England. In March 1872 Sir Charles W. Dilke, M.P. for Chelsea, introduced into parliament a motion which aimed at a complete reform of the civil list. The proposal was rejected by a large majority, but the feeling which inspired it remained alive in the country until the queen conspicuously modified her habits of seclusion. In March 1873 Gladstone resigned on the defeat of his Irish university bill, but on Disraeli's refusal to take his place he returned to office.

In January 1874 the queen's second son, Prince Alfred, married at St. Petersburg the Grand Duchess Marie Alexandrovna, Ozar Alexander II's only daughter. The match was of little political importance. In the same month parliament was dissolved and a conservative government came into power, with Disraeli as prime minister. With Disraeli the queen was in complete sympathy, and it was in conformity with his views in regard to British intervention in foreign politics that she exerted her influence in 1875 to avert the hostilities which again threatened between France and Germany. In 1875 the Prince of Wales, as representative of the queen, made a state tour through India, and in May 1876 the designation of Empress of India was conferred on her by the Royal Titles Bill. In February 1876, and again in February 1877, the queen opened parliament in person. In 1876–8 the queen gave much attention to the position of affairs in eastern Europe. The subject races of the Turkish empire in the Balkans had threatened the Porte with revolt in 1875, and there was the likelihood that Russia, to serve her own ends, might come to the rescue of the insurgents. Beaconsfield adopted Palmerston's policy of 1854, and declared that British interests required the maintenance of the sultan's authority inviolate. Gladstone, who had in 1876 announced his retirement from public life, emerged from his seclusion to oppose the bestowal on Turkey of any English support. The queen used, without success, her private influence to dissuade Russia from interference, and on Russia's declaration of war with Turkey, April 1877, she firmly supported Beaconsfield in a diplomatic struggle which brought Russia to the brink of hostilities with England. The question was settled by the congress of Berlin, June 1878, when Beaconsfield, who acted as English envoy, obtained, in his own phrase, 'peace with honour.'

In April 1879 the queen paid her first visit to Italy, staying at Baveno on Lago Maggiore. The queen again opened parliament in person in February 1880, and in March, after the dissolution, she visited Germany. The ensuing election brought the liberals into power, and the queen reluctantly commissioned Gladstone to form a government. She was seriously perturbed by plans for the further reorganisation of the army. She was unremitting in her admonitions to the government to take vigorous steps in Afghanistan, 1880, and in the Transvaal, 1880–1, and the policy of peace which followed the defeat of General Colley at Majuba Hill, 28 Feb. 1881, conflicted with her views. On 19 April 1881 Beaconsfield died, and the queen treated his loss as a personal bereavement. During the war in Egypt occasioned by Arabi Pasha's rebellion (1882) the queen continued to urge her ministers to energetic action. After the pacification of Egypt she devised a new decoration of the royal red cross for nurses who had rendered efficient service in war. The queen's life was for the fifth time threatened by assassination at Windsor on 2 March 1882, when Roderick Maclean, a lunatic, fired a pistol at her, fortunately without effect. On 4 Dec. 1882 the queen inaugurated the new law courts in the Strand. In 1883–4 Egypt, which was now practically administered by England, became the centre of renewed anxieties. In 1883 the inhabitants of the Soudan revolted. The English ministry decided to abandon the territory, but undertook to relieve several Egyptian garrisons remaining in the Soudan in positions of great peril. General Gordon was despatched to Khartoum, the capital of the disturbed district, with a view to negotiation with the rebels. He was besieged in Khartoum by the mahdi's forces. The queen repeatedly warned the government of the necessity for sending him relief, and in the autumn of 1884 a British army was sent out under Lord Wolseley, but Gordon was killed before a rescue could be effected. The queen reproached her ministers with the death of Gordon, which she regarded as a public disaster. Throughout 1885 she maintained her interest in the operations in the Soudan. The queen lent her support to the Franchise Bill, which, after some opposition from the lords, was passed concurrently with the Redistribution of Seats Bill before the end of the year (1884). She spent the spring of 1885 at Aix-les-Bains, and on her return journey visited Darmstadt and made the acquaintance of Prince Henry of Battenberg, who on 23 July married the queen's youngest daughter, Princess Beatrice. In June the government was defeated on its budget proposals, and Gladstone resigned. Lord Salisbury at once took office as prime minister, but the general election which followed the dissolution in November left the conservatives in a minority, and in January 1886 Salisbury's government was outvoted. Five days previously the queen had opened parliament in person, as it proved, for the last time. Gladstone resumed power, and at once committed his party to the policy of home rule for Ireland. The queen disliked the proposal, and Gladstone's Home Rule Bill was decisively rejected by the House of Commons (7 June). At Gladstone's instance parliament was dissolved; he resigned without meeting the new parliament, where his party was small, and Lord Salisbury for the second time formed a government. In this year (1886) the queen manifested great interest in the Colonial and India exhibition at South Kensington organised by the Prince of Wales (afterwards King Edward VII). On 21 June 1887 and the following days she took part in the public ceremonies in celebration of her jubilee, and on 6 July she laid the foundation-stone of the Imperial Institute, which was erected by public subscription to commemorate the fifty years of her reign.

In March 1888 the queen for the first time visited Florence, and afterwards proceeded to Charlottenburg, the palace of the dying Emperor Frederick. In March 1889 she stayed at Biarritz, and thence visited the queen-regent of Spain at San Sebastian. This was the first occasion on which an English sovereign had visited that country, though Charles I and Charles II went thither as princes. In July the approaching majority of the Prince of Wales's eldest son and the approaching marriage of his eldest daughter compelled the queen to appeal to parliament on the question of suitable provision for the third generation of her family. Precedent justified public provision for all children of the sovereign's sons, and the queen agreed to forego any demand in behalf of her daughters' children. The matter was settled, with Gladstone's assistance, by a grant to the Prince of Wales of 36,000*l.* annually for his children's support. Gladstone's intervention was always remembered by the queen with gratitude. In August 1889 she welcomed her grandson, the German emperor, William II, on his first visit to England since his accession to the throne. The emperor caused the queen to be gazetted honorary colonel of his first regiment of horse guards, on which he bestowed the title of Queen of England's Own. In 1892 a general election returned a majority of home rulers, and Gladstone filled the post of prime minister for the fourth time. In September 1893 his Home Rule Bill, which had passed through the House of Commons, was rejected by the House of Lords. In March 1894 the queen accepted Gladstone's resignation and chose Lord Rosebery to succeed him. In this year the government made further changes in the war office, which strictly limited to five years the tenure of the post of commander-in-chief, and thus finally disposed of the queen's cherished fiction that the head of the army was her permanent personal deputy. The ministry fell in June, and Lord Salisbury resumed office as premier and foreign secretary, with Mr. Chamberlain as colonial secretary. In the spring of 1895 the queen was at Cannes, in 1896 and 1897 at Nice, and in 1898 and 1899 at Cimiez. On 22 June 1897 she took part in a state procession through London to celebrate her 'diamond Jubilee,' the completion of the sixtieth year of her rule. During the closing years of her reign the queen gave close attention to the numerous expeditions in which her armies were engaged, and she was gratified when the rebellion in the Soudan was finally crushed at the battle of Omdurman, 2 Sept. 1898. On the outbreak of the Boer war in 1899, when she was convinced that the peace which she was always anxious to preserve could not be maintained, she exerted her utmost energy to urge her ministers to conduct hostilities with all possible promptitude and effect. To encourage her soldiers she went, in the spring of 1900, for the fourth time to Ireland, whence the armies in the field had been largely recruited. She held her last drawing-room in Buckingham Palace, 4 May. She gave her assent to the Australian commonwealth bill, 27 Aug. In October a general election was deemed necessary by the government, and on the return of a conservative majority Lord Salisbury remained prime minister, but resigned the foreign secretaryship to Lord Lansdowne, formerly minister of war. Throughout the summer the queen experienced acute distress at the accounts of suffering which reached her from South Africa, and her personal sympathy with her troops was intensified by the death of her grandson, Prince Christian Victor of Schleswig-Holstein, from enteric fever contracted in active service. In the autumn of 1900 the queen showed signs of general physical decay, and on 22 Jan. 1901 she died. Her body was conveyed with military honours from Osborne through London to Windsor, and was placed (4 Feb.) in the mausoleum at Frogmore, which had been completed in 1868, and already contained the remains of her husband. On the day following her death her eldest son was proclaimed King Edward VII.

Among the most notable portraits of the queen are paintings or drawings by Sir William Beechey, R.A., 1821; Sir George Hayter, 1833 and 1838; Sir David Wilkie, 1839; Sir Edwin Landseer, 1839 and 1866; F. Winterhalter, 1845 and other years; Baron H. von Angeli, 1875 (of which a copy by Lady Abercromby is in the National Portrait Gallery, London), 1885, and 1897; and M. Benjamin Constant, 1900. Sculptured presentations include a bust by Behnes, 1827; a plaster bust by Sir Edgar Boehm (in National Portrait Gallery); a statue at Winchester by Mr. Alfred Gilbert, R.A.; and a statue at Manchester by Mr. Onslow Ford, R.A. A national memorial in sculpture to be designed by Mr. Thomas Brock, R.A., with an architectural setting by Mr. Aston Webb, A.R.A., is to be placed in the Mall opposite Buckingham Palace. [lx. 260]

WENTWORTH, PETER (1530?–1596), parliamentary leader; of Lillingstone Lovell; M.P., Barnstaple, 1571–2, Tregony, 1576–83, Northampton, 1586–7; attacked Sir Humphrey Gilbert [q. v.] for subserviency to court, 1571; advocated right of House of Commons to discuss Thirty-nine Articles and other church questions in spite of Queen Elizabeth's orders, 1571; imprisoned in Tower of London, 1576, for bitter speech against crown interference with House of Commons, and, 1587, for again challenging Elizabeth's absolutism in ecclesiastical affairs, and, 1593–6, for petitioning Elizabeth to name her successor, and advocating right to succession of Edward Seymour, lord Beauchamp; wrote, 1594, 'A Pithie Exhortation' (printed, 1598), urging Elizabeth to name her successor. [lx. 261]

WENTWORTH, SIR PETER (1592–1675), politician; of Magdalen Hall, Oxford; of Lillingstone Lovell, Oxfordshire; K.B., 1625; high sheriff of Oxfordshire, 1634; M.P., Tamworth, 1641; refused to act as judge of Charles I, 1649; served in Commonwealth councils of state; reviled for immorality by Oliver Cromwell at expulsion of the Rump, 1653; re-took his seat in parliament, 1659; left legacy to John Milton. [lx. 263]

WENTWORTH, THOMAS, first BARON WENTWORTH of Nettlestead (1501–1551), knighted while serving in France, 1523; inherited Nettlestead, Suffolk, 1528; created baron, 1529; embraced protestantism; advocated Henry VIII's divorce from Catherine, 1530; attended Henry VIII to France, 1532; served against Norfolk insurgents, 1549; helped to overthrow Protector Somerset, 1549; privy councillor, 1549–51; lord chamberlain, 1550; granted crown lands. [lx. 264]

WENTWORTH, THOMAS, second BARON WENTWORTH of Nettlestead (1525–1584), eldest son of Thomas Wentworth, first baron Wentworth [q. v.]; perhaps of St. John's College, Cambridge; knighted while serving in Scotland, 1547; M.P., Suffolk, 1547–51; succeeded to barony, 1551; voted for execution of Somerset, 1551; made privy councillor by Queen Mary, 1553; sat on commission to try Northumberland and his supporters, 1553; deputy of Calais, 1553–8; failed to obtain necessary support from England; neglected warnings of imminent French attack, December 1557; surrendered Calais, January 1558; prisoner of war in France, 1558–9; acquitted of charge of treasonable surrender, 1559; sat on commission which condemned Norfolk, 1572. [lx. 265]

WENTWORTH, THOMAS (1568?–1628), lawyer; third son of Peter Wentworth (1530?–1596) [q. v.]; called to bar, Lincoln's Inn, 1594, Lent reader, 1612; recorder of Oxford city, 1607–23; as M.P., Oxford city, 1604–28, steadily opposed the crown; discommonsed by Oxford University, 1611–14; imprisoned for speech against illegal imposts, 1614; advocated war with Spain, 1624. [lx. 267]

WENTWORTH, SIR THOMAS, first EARL OF STRAFFORD (1593–1641), statesman; of Wentworth-Woodhouse, Yorkshire; educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; entered Inner Temple, 1607; knighted, 1611; travelled on continent, 1612–13; M.P., Yorkshire, 1614; succeeded as second baronet, 1614; custos rotulorum, Yorkshire, 1615–1625; began feud with Sir John Savile, afterwards first Baron Savile of Pontefract [q. v.], 1617; as M.P., Yorkshire, 1621, showed firmness and moderation in opposing the crown; as M.P., Pontefract, 1624, opposed war with Spain and showed hostility to puritanism; M.P., Yorkshire, 1625, unseated on Savile's petition, but re-elected; opposed war with Spain, and expressed resentment at dissolution of parliament; appointed sheriff of Yorkshire, 1625, to exclude him from new parliament; opposed Charles I's demands for money, and was removed from commission of peace and replaced by his rival Savile in office of custos rotulorum, 1625; imprisoned for refusal to pay the forced loan, 1627; in the parliament of 1628 led House of Commons, April–May, in endeavour to bring Charles I to some reasonable compromise as regards forced loans, billeting of soldiers, and imprisonment without cause shown; offended Charles I by safeguarding the supplies voted against sudden appropriation by crown; passively accepted the Petition of Right, which was substituted for his own proposals in consequence of Charles I's obstinacy, May–June, 1628; taken into court favour; created Baron and Viscount Wentworth, and made president of council of north, 1628; privy councillor, 1629; drawn into friendship with Laud through common aversion to puritanism, 1630; as president of north, 1631–2, used fine and imprisonment by court of Star-chamber to break down opposition of northern gentry; appointed lord-deputy of Ireland, 1632; entered Dublin, July 1633, and set himself to establish the royal authority by reducing army to strict discipline, suppressing piracy in St. George's Channel, encouraging linen industry, compelling restitution by nobility of embezzled church property, forcing acceptance by clergy of English Thirty-nine Articles; obtained supplies from Irish parliament, 1634, on promise of remedial measures, which were partly conceded in 1635; laid a heavy hand on English officials in Dublin, 1634–5, e.g. on Sir Paul Crosby, privy councillor, Lord Mountnorris, vice-treasurer, and Adam Loftus, first viscount Loftus of Ely [q. v.], lord-chancellor; offended Henrietta Maria by refusing pensions on Irish establishment to her favourites; compelled packed juries to declare all Connaught crown property, 1635, intending to bring in English settlers; advised Charles I against the naval intervention in foreign affairs which he contemplated to provide a colourable excuse for demanding ship-money, the judges having pronounced in favour of the legality of his right to levy it, 1637; advocated invasion of Scotland to crush covenanters and enforce adoption of English liturgy, 1638, but vainly urged Charles I to train his troops before attempting invasion, 1639; came to London to prosecute his Irish opponents in Star-chamber court, May 1639; became informally Charles I's chief adviser, September 1639; advised demand of loan from privy councillors and summoning parliament to vote supplies, promising, as a good example, a large loan from himself and a prompt vote of supplies from Irish parliament; was created Baron Raby and Earl of Strafford, 1640, thereby deeply offending Sir Henry Vane the elder [q. v.], owner of Raby Castle; created lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 1640; offered service of Irish troops against Scotland and to command them in person; obtained subsidies to amount of 180,000*l.* from Irish parliament, March 1640; attended Short parliament, April 1640; advised Charles I personally to invite peers to insist on Commons voting supplies before discussing grievances; taken into favour by Henrietta Maria; vainly advised Charles I to be content with part of the subsidies asked; assented to dissolution of Short parliament; in committee of privy council, 5 May 1640, urged collection of funds by force and immediate invasion of Scotland, promising, it was reported, help of Irish troops against both Scottish and English rebels; popularly styled 'Black Tom Tyrant,' from suspicion of this advice; vainly urged Charles I to immediate and despotic action, July 1640; received patent as captain-general in Ireland, with prospect of employment in Scotland and England, August 1640; took command of Charles I's force in Yorkshire, and prevailed on Yorkshire to adopt defensive measures against the invading Scots army, September 1640; attended Long parliament on Charles I's personal guarantee of his safety; urged Charles I to send parliamentary leaders to the Tower of London; impeached by Commons and sent to the Tower of London, 1640; trial opened, March 1641; procedure by impeachment abandoned because of favourable impression produced on peers by his vigorous defence and in fear of northern army being brought to coerce parliament; bill of attainder against him passed by Commons, 21 April, passed by Lords, 8 May, in panic caused by discovery of court plot to release him, and introduce into England Irish and Dutch troops; his attainder assented to by Charles, 10 May, in dread of mob violence; His 'Posthumous Works' appeared, 1728. [lxiii. 195]

WYCK, JOHN (1652–1700), painter; born at Haarlem; came to England when young; enjoyed great reputation for battle and hunting scenes. [lxiii. 202]

WYCLIFFE, JOHN (d. 1384), religious reformer and theologian; born at Hipswell; probably fellow of Balliol College, Oxford, and subsequently (in 1361) master; probably not identical with John Wyclif, who was appointed warden of Canterbury Hall, Oxford, 1365, and who was perhaps at Merton College, Oxford, and rector of Mayfield; vicar of Fillingham; prebendary of Westbury, 1361; held benefice of Ludgershall, 1368; wrote, 1366 or 1376, controversial tract, 'Determinatio quedam de Dominio contra unum monachum'; graduated doctor of theology, c. 1372; received as canon of Lincoln licence from Pope Gregory XI to keep Westbury prebend, even after obtaining prebend at Lincoln, 1373; sent to Bruges as ambassador to treat with papal legates at Ghent about non-observance of statute of provisors and other matters, 1374; rector of Lutterworth, c. 1374; gained favour of Duke of Lancaster and Henry, lord Percy, by his opinions about the relations between temporal and spiritual power; summoned before archbishop and suffragans in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, on charge of heresy, but, the court having broken up in confusion, had no sentence passed on him, 1377; again tried, at Lambeth, and with similar results, 1378, his accusers formulating charges (including his assertion that the ecclesiastical ruler, and even the Roman pontiff, may legitimately be corrected or even accused by subjects and laymen) suggested by his hostility to the secularity of the mediæval church; instituted his 'poor preachers' and the translation of the whole bible into English for the first time, himself translating the gospels, probably the whole New Testament, and possibly part of the Old Testament, the work being edited by John Purvey [q. v.] and completed by him before 1400; peremptorily rejected transubstantiation, c. 1380, and was forbidden to teach his doctrine in Oxford University, 1381, while a court, summoned by the archbishop, 1382, condemned theses of his which implied that he held that all authority, secular and ecclesiastical, was derived from God, and was forfeited when the possessor of it was in a state of mortal sin, that he denied the doctrine of transubstantiation, on which the power of the priesthood was fundamentally based, and that he condemned monasticism in all its forms; left Oxford, where, in spite of royal and ecclesiastical commands, he was not treated with severity, and retired to Lutterworth, occupying himself with preaching, translating the bible, and writing controversial pamphlets; buried at Lutterworth, but his body disinterred, 1428, and thrown into the river Swift. He was famous as a philosopher before he became famous as a theologian, and famous as a theologian before he became a heresiarch, and the connection between his philosophy and his theology was neither external nor accidental. He discovered in nominalism the seat of all theological error, and his practical religious teaching was above all things ethical. The more important of his Latin works (which with two exceptions have been published by the Wyclif Society) are; I. (in early life) 'De Logica,' 'De Compositione Hominis,' 'XIII Quæstiones logicæ et philosophicæ,' 'De Ente Prædicamentali'; II. (up to 1379) 'De Incarnatione Verbi,' 'De Dominio Divino,' 'De Dominio Civili,' 'De Ecclesia,' 'De Officio Pastorali' (published by Lechler, 1863), and 'De Officio Regis'; III. (from 1379) 'Dialogus' or 'Speculum Ecclesie Militantis,' 'De Eucharistia,' 'De Simonia,' 'De Apostasia,' 'De Blasphemia,' 'Opus Evangelicum,' and 'Trialogus' (published by Lechler, 1869). 'Select English Works of Wyclif,' edited by T. Arnold, appeared 1869–71, and 'English Works of Wyclif hitherto unprinted,' by F. D. Matthew, 1880 (Early English Text Society). [lxiii. 202]

THE CONCISE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

1901–1921

NOTE

The Epitome of 1901–1911 was made under the supervision of Sir Sidney Lee, and was published in 1913. It has now been reset and combined with the Epitome of 1912–1921.

When referring from the Concise D.N.B. to the main Dictionary, it is important to note that the latter now comprises four alphabetical series:

1. The D.N.B. original issue, containing obituaries from the earliest times to the dates of publication (1885–1900).

2. Supplement containing additional obituaries, mostly 1885–1900.

3. The Twentieth Century D.N.B. Obituaries 1901–1911.

4. The Twentieth Century D.N.B. Obituaries 1912–1921.

The year of death is therefore the necessary clue to the whereabouts of a memoir in the Dictionary.

EAST, SIR ALFRED (1849–1913), painter and etcher; studied art at Glasgow and in Paris; R.A. exhibitor, 1883; A.R.A., 1899; R.A., 1913; president of Royal Society of British Artists, 1906; knighted, 1910; in his art primarily an interpreter of landscape.

EAST, SIR CECIL JAMES (1837–1908), general; joined 82nd regiment, 1854; served in Crimea (1855) and Indian Mutiny (1857), in Lushai expedition (1871–2) and Zulu war (1879); commanded first brigade in Burmese expedition, 1886–7; C.B., 1887; governor of Royal Military College, Sandhurst, 1893–8; lieutenant-general, 1896; general, 1902; K.C.B., 1897.

EASTLAKE, CHARLES LOCKE (1836–1906), keeper of the National Gallery, London; secretary to Royal Institute of British Architects, 1866–77; as keeper and secretary to National Gallery, 1878–98, rearranged the paintings there; wrote 'A History of the Gothic Revival,' 1871, and 'Notes on the Principal Pictures' at Milan, 1883, Paris, 1883, Munich, 1884, and Venice, 1888.

EATON, WILLIAM MERITON, second BARON CHEYLESMORE (1843–1902), mezzotint collector; educated at Eton; succeeded to peerage, 1891; formed largest private mezzotint collection; bequeathed some 10,000 mezzotint portraits to British Museum, which were exhibited, 1905–10.

EBSWORTH, JOSEPH WOODFALL (1824–1908), editor of ballads; younger son of Joseph Ebsworth [q. v.]; spent his youth in Edinburgh, where his father kept a bookshop; studied art; employed in Manchester by Faulkner Bros., lithographers, 1848; exhibited four water-colour views of Edinburgh at Scottish Academy, 1849; wrote verse and prose for Scottish press, 1850–60; B.A., St. John's College, Cambridge, 1864; M.A., 1867; took Anglican orders, 1864; after serving cures, chiefly at Bradford, was vicar of Molash, Kent, 1871–94; devoted himself to editing old collections of 'drolleries' and ballads for the Ballad Society; produced 'Bagford Ballads' (from the British Museum), 1876–80, and completed a reprint of 'The Roxburgh Ballads' (vols. v–ix), 1883–99; F.S.A., 1881.

EDDIS, EDEN UPTON (1812–1901), portrait painter; exhibited at Royal Academy, 1834–81; painted subjects of rustic genre and children, and portraits including Macaulay, 1850, Lord Overstone, 1851, Lord Coleridge, 1878, Sydney Smith, and Theodore Hook (in National Portrait Gallery).

EDOUIN, WILLIE (1846–1908), comedian, whose real name was WILLIAM FREDERICK BRYER; toured through Australia and the Far East, 1857; joined Lydia Thompson [q.v.] in New York, 1870; first appeared in London, 1874; opened Toole's Theatre successfully with 'The Babes, or Whines from the Wood,' 1884; scored successes in 'Our Flat,' 1889–90, 'La Poupée,' 1897, and 'The girl from Kay's,' 1902; admirable for grotesquerie and whimsicality.

EDWARD VII (1841–1910), KING OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND AND OF THE BRITISH DOMINIONS BEYOND THE SEAS, EMPEROR OF INDIA, born at Buckingham Palace on 9 Nov. 1841, was eldest son and second child of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert. Baptized at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, on 25 Jan. 1842, he was named Albert after his father and Edward after his mother's father, Edward, Duke of Kent. From childhood he spoke English and German, and early learned French, of which in adult years he had an exceptional mastery. In 1846 he paid a first visit to Cornwall and Wales, in 1848 to Scotland, and in 1849 to Ireland. His parents, prompted by Baron Stockmar, bestowed great care on his education, and watched his development closely. He was subjected to a strict discipline under his parents' eyes, at first by private tutors; but he was always impatient of serious study. His permitted recreations included the theatre and music, and he practised elocution and drawing with some success. Practically isolated from boys of his own age, he had small opportunity of playing games, but he rode well and acquired a lifelong love of horses and dogs. With his parents he attended the opening of the Great Exhibition (1 May 1851) and of the Crystal Palace (June 1854), and he went to Paris for the first time on a visit to Napoleon III and the Empress Eugénie, Aug. 1855. Walking tours through Dorset (Aug. 1856) and through the English Lakes (1857) were followed by a longer foreign tour for study and sightseeing down the Rhine and into Switzerland (July–Oct. 1857). Confirmed at Windsor on 1 April 1858, he was provided with a semi-independent household at White Lodge in Richmond Park (May–Nov. 1858), and on 9 Nov. 1858, his seventeenth birthday, when he received a very solemn admonition from his parents, he was gazetted colonel in the army unattached and nominated K.G. A governor, Col. Robert Bruce, was appointed next day. With Bruce he visited at Potsdam his eldest sister, who had lately married Prince Frederick of Prussia, and afterwards made a four months' sojourn in Rome (Jan.–April 1859). He visited Pope Pius IX and met Robert Browning and Frederic Leighton. On his way home he stayed with King Pedro at Lisbon. Next summer his father sent him to Edinburgh to study under Lyon Playfair. In spite of publicly expressed doubt as to the wisdom of pursuing too academic a training, he matriculated at Oxford on 17 Nov., as a member of Christ Church, and remained in residence till the end of summer term, 1860. On 8 July 1860 he set out for Canada on the invitation of the Canadian government, accompanied by the Duke of Newcastle, secretary of state for the colonies, and a distinguished suite. It was the first visit of a royal prince to a British colony. At Montreal (4 Sept.) he opened the great railway bridge across the St. Lawrence river, and at Ottawa he laid the foundation stone of the parliament building. Passing to the United States, he was cordially welcomed at Washington by President Buchanan, and planted a chestnut tree by Washington's tomb at Mount Vernon. He returned to Plymouth, 15 Nov. The expedition had the effect of strengthening the loyalty of Canada to the mother country and of increasing the good feeling between England and the United States. After spending the rest of the year at Oxford, the Prince continued his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, through 1861. In Aug. he joined the 2nd battalion of grenadier guards in camp at the Curragh, and next month made a third tour in Germany, where a first meeting was arranged for him with his future wife, Princess Alexandra, eldest daughter of Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glücksburg. Her father was next heir to the throne of Denmark, which he ascended as Christian IX on 15 Nov. 1863; the first meeting of the Prince and Princess Alexandra was in the cathedral at Speier, 24 Sept. 1861; each made a good impression on the other. Resuming residence at Cambridge for the Michaelmas term, he was elected a bencher of the Middle Temple (31 Oct.), and opened the new library at the Inn. On 13 Dec. he was summoned from Cambridge to Windsor owing to the illness of his father, who died next day. Thereupon his widowed mother claimed that full control which his father had hitherto exercised; Queen Victoria never ceased to think of the Prince of Wales save as a boy. But his views of life broadened on reaching man's estate, and he chafed against the perpetual tutelage to which his mother sought to subject him. In accordance with plans formed by his father he made a tour in the Holy Land, Feb.–May 1862, accompanied among others by Arthur Penrhyn Stanley [q. v.]; on his return journey he was entertained at Constantinople by the Sultan, at Athens by the King of Greece, and at Fontainebleau by the Emperor Napoleon III. On 9 Sept. 1862 he was formally betrothed to Princess Alexandra at King Leopold's palace of Laeken; on 1 Nov. 1862 the Queen gave formal assent to the union, the announcement of which evoked enthusiasm in England and Denmark, but was received coolly in Germany. At the end of the year his sister, the crown princess of Prussia, with her husband, accompanied the Prince of Wales on a tour through the Mediterranean. Meanwhile a separate establishment was formed for him at home. The estate of Sandringham in Norfolk was purchased for 220,000*l.* out of the income accumulated during his minority from the Duchy of Cornwall, which was the heir-apparent's appanage. Marlborough House in London was provided at the public expense. On 25 Feb. 1863 he held a levée for his mother at St. James's Palace, and thus first performed a ceremonial function. On 5 Feb. 1863 he took his seat in the House of Lords at the opening of parliament. Parliament granted him an annuity of 40,000*l.* and one of 10,000*l.* to his bride,

Princess Alexandra, with a prospective annuity of 30,000*l.* in case of widowhood. The marriage took place in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, on 10 March 1863, and many festivities followed. On 2 May he first attended the Royal Academy banquet. On 7 June he received the freedom of the City of London. On 16 June he was made hon. D.C.L. at Oxford, and next year hon. LL.D. at Cambridge. While spending much time as a country gentleman and sportsman and visiting annually Scotland, the Riviera, and Homburg, he assumed the rôle of leader of fashionable life in London, encouraging the lighter social amusements, and forming a wide and cosmopolitan circle of acquaintances. His mother excluded him from all political responsibilities, but he carried on and extended his father's work of charity and public utility. He became president of the Society of Arts (22 Oct. 1863) and president of St. Bartholomew's Hospital (20 March 1867), and was thenceforth indefatigable in inaugurating public buildings, and in presiding at charity festivals. He thrice visited Ireland at this period—in 1865, when he opened the International Exhibition at Dublin (8 May); in 1868 (with the Princess), when he was made a Knight of St. Patrick and hon. LL.D. Trinity College, Dublin; and in 1871, when he opened the Royal Agricultural Society's Exhibition. Despite exclusion from political business, the Prince interested himself in foreign affairs. His request for access to foreign office papers was practically refused by the Queen on account of his alleged want of discretion. Frank in expression of sympathy with Denmark during the Schleswig-Holstein crisis (1864), he sought first-hand intelligence from men in public life at home and abroad. In 1866 he first went to Russia for the wedding of his wife's sister Dagmar to Tsarevitch Alexander. A long tour (Nov. 1868–May 1869) embraced Copenhagen, Stockholm, Berlin, Vienna, Egypt (where he inspected the newly completed Suez Canal), Constantinople, and Paris. He won golden opinions at foreign courts. During the Franco-German war (1870) he manifested sympathy with France and showed much kindness to Napoleon III and his family in their English exile. Persistent rumours of the Prince's addiction to frivolous amusements grew in 1870, when he appeared in the witness-box to deny imputations in Sir Charles Mordaunt's action for divorce against his wife (Feb.). The sensational press abounded in scandalous insinuations which were reproduced in 'The coming K——,' a clever parody of Tennyson's 'Idylls,' and many like satires in verse. Meanwhile the Prince opened for the Queen the Thames Embankment (13 July 1871) and presided over a series of international exhibitions at South Kensington which were continued for four years without success (1871–4). In Nov. 1871 he was attacked by typhoid and was gravely ill for a month. After attending a national thanksgiving for his recovery at St. Paul's Cathedral (27 Feb. 1872), he completed his convalescence in a Mediterranean yachting tour, revisiting Pope Pius IX at Rome. Anxiety over the Prince's illness revived enthusiasm for the monarchy. Gladstone, with whom the Prince's relations were always friendly, vainly urged the Queen to provide the Prince with regular employment either in India or Ireland. He was made field-marshal on 10 June 1875. He was at Vienna for the opening of the International Exhibition, May 1873, and at St. Petersburg for the marriage of his brother, the Duke of Edinburgh, to the Tsar's daughter, 1874. He was tactfully entertained at Birmingham by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, then mayor, on 3 Nov. 1874. A tour in India followed, Oct. 1875 to May 1876; he was officially entertained by the Indian government at Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta, and enjoyed much sport as guest of native princes. The personal tie between the princes of India and English royalty was greatly strengthened by his visit. In Europe his interest in France steadily grew; there he was friendly with all political parties and ranks. As president of the British section of the Paris Exhibition, 1878, he advocated at opening ceremonies a good understanding between the two countries. He formed the acquaintance of Gambetta. Though Lord Beaconsfield shared the Queen's doubts of his discretion, the Prince favoured the conservative leader's anti-Russian policy, 1876–8. On 6 May 1879 he voted in the House of Lords for the deceased wife's sister bill. Becoming intimate with Sir Charles Dilke when under-secretary for foreign affairs (1880–2) in Gladstone's second ministry, he sought to aid in Paris Dilke's negotiations with the French government for an Anglo-French commercial treaty. He attended the funeral at St. Petersburg, March 1881, of Tsar Alexander II, who had been assassinated. His offer to serve in the Egyptian campaign was refused, July 1882. Openly disapproving the recall of Sir Bartle Frere from the Cape, 1880, he condemned the pusillanimity of liberal policy in Egypt and the Sudan, 1884, and publicly deplored the sacrifice of Gordon. Appointed member of the royal commission on housing, Feb. 1884, he was friendly with all his fellow commissioners, who included two representatives of labour, Henry Broadhurst and Joseph Arch. Revisiting Ireland, April 1885, he was coolly received by nationalists, but generally met with a cordial welcome.

In middle life the Prince was active in freemasonry, becoming grand master of the order, Sept. 1875. Appointed trustee of the British Museum, May 1881, he performed his duties regularly. He helped to establish the Royal College of Music, 1882–3. His public activities took him to all parts of the country. He inaugurated the Mersey Tunnel, 28 April 1886, Truro Cathedral, 1880–7, and the Tower Bridge, 1886–94; was four times president of the Royal Agricultural Society; helped to organize at South Kensington International Fisheries Exhibition (1883), Health Exhibition (1884), Inventions and Music Exhibition (1885), and India and Colonies Exhibition (1886), and interested himself in founding the Imperial Institute to celebrate Queen Victoria's jubilee, 1887.

On 10 March 1888 the Prince celebrated his silver wedding. He showed much sympathy with his widowed sister, the Empress Frederick, when her husband, Emperor Frederick III of Germany, died of cancer (15 June 1888) two months after his accession. Though there was mutual affection between the Prince and his nephew the new emperor William II, they often caused one another passing irritation. The Prince warmly welcomed Emperor William on his first visit to England after his accession, Aug. 1889. On his eldest daughter's marriage, 1889, the Prince invited additional pecuniary provision for his family. Parliament granted an extra annuity of 36,000*l.* to terminate six months after Queen Victoria's death.

The Prince remained a constant patron of the theatre in London, maintaining friendly relations with Sir Henry Irving and leading actors. But his chief amusement from middle life onwards was horse-racing, training horses at Newmarket and often occupying rooms at the Jockey Club there; he thrice won the Derby—with Persimmon (1896), Diamond Jubilee (1900), and with Minoru (1909); he won the Grand National at Liverpool with Ambush II (1900). For a time he was prominent in yacht racing, and won many prizes with the 'Britannia', a vessel designed for him in 1892. His indulgence in sport was deemed excessive by the austere, and on 5 June 1891 he somewhat alienated public opinion by his evidence in the Tranby Croft case [see under WILSON, CHARLES HENRY, first BARON NUNBURNHOLME], when it was admitted that he played baccarat for high stakes; writing privately to Archbishop Benson of Canterbury (13 Aug. 1891), he denied sympathy with gambling. During Lord Salisbury's ministry (1886–92), while taking no part in home politics, he frequently expressed his desire for a good understanding between England and France when visiting the latter country. He engaged in sporting tours in Austria, in Roumania and Hungary (1888), and was the guest of Baron Hirsch, the Jewish millionaire, in Hungary (1894); in the latter year he twice visited Russia, for the marriage of his wife's niece, Xenia, to the Grand Duke Alexander Michälovitch (July), and for the funeral of his wife's brother-in-law, Tsar Alexander III (Oct.). During Gladstone's last ministry (1892–4) much official intelligence was communicated to him with the Queen's reluctant consent; he became a member of the old age pensions commission, 1893; his friendship with Gladstone continued till the statesman's death; he was a pall-bearer at Westminster Abbey at Gladstone's funeral on 25 May 1898, and was president of the National Memorial Committee (July). In 1895, when Salisbury formed a new administration, the Prince was accorded the cabinet members' right of receiving the foreign dispatches. He devoted some energy to encouraging medical research, helping to found the National Society for the Prevention of Consumption (21 Dec. 1888), and the national leprosy fund which commemorated the tragic heroism of Father Damien (June 1889). At Queen Victoria's diamond jubilee (June 1897) he received the new dignity of grand master and principal grand cross of the Order of the Bath, and he inaugurated in honour of the jubilee the Prince of Wales's Hospital Fund for London, which was renamed on his accession

King Edward VII Fund. The difficulties with the Transvaal Republic which led in 1899 to the South African war alienated the goodwill of Europe towards England; on 4 April 1900 the Prince while travelling with the Princess to Denmark was shot at without injury by a youth Sipido at the Gare du Nord, Brussels; though president of the British section of the Paris Exhibition of 1899 he, contrary to his custom, did not attend the inauguration in Paris.

The Prince took the oaths of sovereignty under the style of Edward VII the day after Queen Victoria's death at Osborne on 22 Jan. 1901. His speech to the privy council, which was his own composition and was delivered without notes, pronounced his full determination to be a constitutional sovereign in the strictest sense of the word. During the new session of parliament, which he opened on 14 Feb. 1901, the additional title was bestowed on him of 'King of the British Dominions beyond the Seas'; he was allowed an annual grant of 470,000*l.* apart from the income of the Duchy of Lancaster (60,000*l.* a year), and the expense of maintaining the royal palaces and royal yachts. Friends' anticipations that he would prove unequal to his new station were belied. He held no well-defined views of domestic legislation, but was deeply interested in foreign policy, and was punctual in formal business. His old circle of friends remained unchanged, and he indulged in all his former amusements, but he gave new splendour to royal ceremonials and exercised a brilliant hospitality in London, which became the headquarters of the court after an interval of forty years. He spent little time at Windsor. He had inherited Balmoral and Osborne from his mother; but he was not often at Balmoral, and Osborne he abandoned, converting it into a convalescent home for army and naval officers, 9 Aug. 1902. He welcomed the close of the South African war (31 May 1902), and attended a thanksgiving service in St. Paul's (8 June); the coronation was appointed for 26 June, on a scale of exceptional magnificence; but two days before, the king was compelled to submit to an operation for perityphlitis, from which he made a good recovery, and the postponed ceremony took place on 9 Aug. After a yachting cruise to Scotland he made a royal progress through South London, and lunched with the lord mayor at the Guildhall, 24 Oct. Meanwhile Lord Salisbury resigned the premiership (11 July 1902), and was succeeded by Mr. Balfour.

King Edward travelled much abroad during the reign, in accordance with early practice; he attended the funeral of his sister, Emperess Frederick, at Friedrichshof (5 Aug. 1901), and after visiting Homburg went to Copenhagen, where he met Tsar Nicholas. His already large kinship with foreign sovereigns was extended by the election of his son-in-law Prince Charles of Denmark as King of Norway (Oct. 1905) and by the marriage of his niece Princess Ena of Battenberg to Alphonso XIII, King of Spain (31 May 1906); wits of Paris thenceforth called him 'l'oncle de l'Europe.' His friendly relations with foreign countries remained much as before his accession. There was no foundation for the current belief of a personal hostility to Germany. The German Emperor visited Sandringham for celebration of the King's sixty-first birthday, 9 Nov. 1902. In spring of 1903 a long foreign tour brought the King to Lisbon, Rome, and Paris, with Mr. Charles Hardinge, then assistant under-secretary of the foreign office, in attendance. In Paris, which he had not visited for three years, he regained his former popularity, and conspicuously helped to improve the relations between the two countries. The entente cordiale was concluded on 8 April 1904. He was entertained by the German Emperor at Kiel on 29 June 1904. Thenceforth he spent three or four months each year abroad. Several weeks each spring were passed at Biarritz, and a like period of the autumn at Marienbad. He cruised in the Mediterranean during springs of 1905, '6, '7 and '9, meeting the Kings of Greece, Spain, and Italy; and he visited the northern courts of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, April 1908. Frequently passing to and from Paris, he enjoyed varied intercourse with French society. Only during 1905 did he fail to visit Germany, where the press imputed to him anti-German tendencies. In August 1906, 1907, and 1908 he met the German Emperor in Germany on good terms. The Emperor paid a state visit to Windsor, 11–18 Nov. 1907, and King Edward returned the compliment at Berlin, Feb. 1909. He met the Emperor of Austria thrice—once at Gmunden (Aug. 1905) and twice at Ischl (Aug. 1907–8). He visited the Tsar of Russia at Reval (9 June 1908) and the Tsar was his guest at Cowes (Aug. 1909); some resentment was shown in England at the King's friendly relations with the Tsar, owing to English sympathy with Russian revolutionary movements.

Meanwhile at home he continued to identify himself with philanthropic work and public improvements. He laid the foundation stone of Liverpool Cathedral, 19 June 1904; opened university buildings at Sheffield (1905), Leeds (1908), and Birmingham (1909), and he thrice visited Ireland—in 1903, 1904, and 1907. He intervened little in domestic politics, though he was interested in appointments. With his third prime minister, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, he developed cordial relations. Of Campbell-Bannerman's colleagues Lord Carrington was an old friend, and with (Lord) Haldane he was soon very intimate. On Campbell-Bannerman's retirement, March 1908, the King invited Mr. Asquith to fill the vacant office. When the House of Lords threatened the rejection of Mr. Lloyd George's budget of 1909, the King vainly urged on the conservative leaders the impolicy of that action. On the defeat of the budget in the Lords (30 Nov.) and the continuance of the liberals in office after the general election, the King raised no remonstrance to his ministers' proposal to curtail for the future the veto of the Lords. The King disliked the situation but abstained from interference; the controversy was still in progress at his death. During his usual spring visit to Biarritz in 1910 he suffered severely from bronchial trouble, but he returned to London (27 April) apparently in good health. Taken ill in London on 2 May, he died at Buckingham Palace on 6 May, and his only surviving son was proclaimed George V. The dead King lay in state in Westminster Hall (16–20 May), and was buried in the vault below St. George's Chapel, Windsor.

King Edward eminently satisfied contemporary conditions of kingship; of cosmopolitan temperament, he spoke with equal ease English, French, and German; he revived the ceremonial splendour of the crown, and proved himself an admirable representative of the nation abroad. The austere deemed his addiction to pleasure excessive; but his support of philanthropic causes silenced criticism. He had an expert faculty for business, and distributed his energies over a wide field; he gathered orally very varied stores of knowledge, and remembered personal details with great accuracy; he never seems to have forgotten a face. Personally courageous, he admired every manifestation of heroism. He was greatly attached to dumb animals. Memorials have been erected in all parts of the empire.

By his wife, Queen Alexandra, the King had two sons, Albert Edward (b. 8 Jan. 1864, d. 14 Jan. 1892) and his successor, George (b. 3 June 1865); a third son, John (b. 6 April 1871) lived only a day; the two surviving sons were both educated in youth as naval cadets. Of the King's three daughters, Princess Louise (b. 20 Feb. 1867), afterwards Princess Royal, married the Duke of Fife (27 July 1889); the second, Princess Victoria, was born on 6 July 1868; and the third, Maud (b. 26 Nov. 1869), married in 1896 Prince Charles of Denmark, afterwards Haakon VII, King of Norway.

MEREDITH, GEORGE (1828–1909), novelist and poet; grandson of Melchizedek Meredith (d. 1804), a prosperous tailor and naval outfitter of Portsmouth [see the novel 'Evan Harrington']; was privately educated at Portsmouth and Southsea and at the Moravian school at Neuwied, where he became an adept at German, 1843–4; was articled to a London solicitor of Bohemian tastes, 1845; soon turning to journalism, he contributed poems to 'Household Words' and to 'Chambers's Journal'; making acquaintance of a son of Thomas Love Peacock [q. v.] he married Peacock's daughter, 9 Aug. 1849; boarding at Weybridge he came to know there Sir Alexander and Lady Duff Gordon, and afterwards settled in a cottage at Lower Halliford. In 1858 he was deserted by his wife (d. 1861), who had borne him a son, Arthur Gryffydh (1853–1890). Meanwhile, besides writing for 'Fraser's Magazine,' he published 'Poems' (with dedication to Peacock), 1851; 'The Shaving of Shagpat: an Arabian Entertainment,' 1855, and 'Farina, a Legend of Cologne,' 1857. 'The Ordeal of Richard Feverel,' the first of his great novels, came out in 1859; the book introduced him to Swinburne and the pre-Raphaelite group, while through the Duff Gordons his acquaintance with other notable people quickly grew, but few copies of the book were sold, and his means were long scanty and precarious. He worked regularly for the 'Ipswich Journal,' 1859–75; contributed to 'Once a Week' six poems, 1859, and a new novel, 'Evan Harrington,' serially through 1860; made his residence at Copsham near Esher, 1860, where his intimate circle soon included Frederick Augustus Maxse [q. v.], J. A. Cotter Morison [q. v.], and others; found his chief recreation in long walks in Surrey and occasionally in France and Switzerland; lodged for a time with Rossetti and Swinburne at the Queen's House, Chelsea, 1861–2; published 'Modern Love and Poems of the English Roadside,' 1862; became contributor to the 'Morning Post,' 1862; was reader to Chapman & Hall from 1862 to 1894; brought out in 1864 'Emilia in England' (later renamed 'Sandra Belloni'); married his second wife Sept. 1864, and after some years at Norbiton finally settled for life at Flint Cottage facing Boxhill, 1867. There his second wife died, 17 Sept. 1889, leaving a son and daughter. He published 'Rhoda Fleming,' 1865; contributed serially to 'Fortnightly Review' in 1866 'Vittoria,' a sequel to 'Emilia,' which was expanded in separate issue; went to Italy as special correspondent for 'Morning Post' during war with Austria, 1866; contributed serially to the 'Cornhill' 'The Adventures of Harry Richmond,' 1870 (separately issued in 1871); published 'Odes in Contribution to the Song of French History,' 1871, 'Beauchamp's Career,' 1876 (after serial issue in condensed form in the 'Fortnightly,' 1875), and the 'Egoist,' 1879 (after serial issue in 'Glasgow Weekly Herald'); delivered (1 Feb. 1877) at London Institution a characteristic lecture on 'The Idea of Comedy and the Uses of the Comic Spirit' (printed in 'New Quarterly Magazine,' 1877, and separately, 1897); published 'The Tragic Comedians,' embodying the love story of Ferdinand Lassalle, the German socialist, in Dec. 1880 (after serial issue in 'Fortnightly'), and 'Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth,' 1883. Though both his novels and poetry won growing appreciation from critical circles, the public showed small interest until publication of 'Diana of the Crossways,' 1885 (after serial issue in the 'Fortnightly'). There followed 'Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life,' 1887, 'A Reading of Earth,' 1888 (two of his most characteristic volumes of verse), and the last three novels, 'One of Our Conquerors,' 1891, 'Lord Ormont and his Aminta' (serially issued in 'Pall Mall Magazine,' 1894), and 'The Amazing Marriage,' begun in 1879 and serially issued in 'Scribner's Magazine' through 1895. In his last years he published many expressions of opinion on public questions, but was from 1893 disabled from active exercise by paraplegia. He received in old age many marks of public regard. Addresses were presented by his admirers on both his seventieth and eightieth birthdays. He was president of the Society of Authors from 1892 to death, and was admitted to Order of Merit, 1905. He died at Flint Cottage, 18 May, and was buried in Dorking cemetery, 23 May, 1909; a memorial service was held in Westminster Abbey on day of funeral. There appeared posthumously 'Celt and Saxon,' an unfinished story ('Fortnightly,' 1910), and 'The Sentimentalists,' a conversational comedy, was produced at Duke of York's Theatre, March 1910; 'Last Poems' came out in 1910. Two collections were made of his work; the edition de luxe (36 vols. 1896–1911), and the memorial edition (27 vols. 1909–11). A collection of his letters appeared in 1912. A portrait by Watts is in National Portrait Gallery.

RHODES, CECIL JOHN (1853–1902), imperialist and benefactor; fifth son of Francis William Rhodes, vicar of Bishop Stortford, Hertfordshire; was educated at Bishop Stortford grammar school, 1861–9; owing to failure of health, he went to South Africa to join his eldest brother, who was growing cotton in Natal, 1870; removed to Orange Free State on discovery of diamonds there, 1871; worked with his brother a moderately prosperous claim; meanwhile matriculated at Oriel College, Oxford, 13 Oct. 1873; revisited Oxford at frequent intervals until he succeeded in graduating as a passman B.A. and M.A., 17 Dec. 1881; during this period Rhodes with partners increased his holdings in Kimberley diamond fields, obtaining a large interest in the De Beers mines there; in 1880 he helped to establish De Beers mining company; during 1875 he made solitary journey through Bechuanaland and Transvaal; formed the aspiration to work with Dutch settlers and to federate South Africa under British rule with Cape Dutch assent; was elected to Cape legislature for newly-formed constituency of Barkly West (1880) and retained seat for life; in the South African parliament he from the first sought to maintain wide powers of local self-government while extending British settlement and influence; soon concentrated political activities on northern expansion of the British dominion; aided in securing great part of Bechuanaland for the Cape government in spite of rivalry of Transvaal Republic, 1882; when the whole of Bechuanaland was formally annexed, Rhodes was made deputy commissioner, 1884; and he negotiated in person with President Kruger the withdrawal of Boer claims to portions of the territory. After he had made terms with Lobengula, king of Matabeleland, the British South Africa Company was incorporated by royal charter to administer territory north of Bechuanaland, 1889; this territory was named Rhodesia after the projector of the scheme. In 1887 and 1888 Rhodes succeeded in amalgamating the diamond mines about Kimberley under the style of the Consolidated Mines, a corporation of which he became chairman and ruler; by skilful negotiation this new company acquired the interest in the Kimberley mine which had been controlled by Rhodes's chief rival in the diamond fields, Barnett Isaacs Barnato [q.v.]; at the same time Rhodes acquired important share in the newly-discovered gold mines on Witwatersrand in the Transvaal and helped to form the corporation known as the Consolidated Goldfields of South Africa. In the organization of Rhodesia by the chartered company, of which (Sir) L. S. Jameson [q. v.] became administrator in 1890, Rhodes played an energetic part. He directed the war with the Matabeles, 1893–4, whereby he greatly extended the company's territory. From July 1890 to Jan. 1896 he was also prime minister of the Cape; his ministry carried through reforms in local administration and native policy, and sought to unite English and Dutch interests; in pursuit of his ideal of imperial federation he subscribed in 1880 10,000*l.* to the home rule party in England; in 1893 he reconstructed his ministry owing to internal differences. At the end of 1895 Rhodes secretly encouraged the Uitlander population on the Rand and in the Transvaal to look to an armed insurrection for redress of their grievances against the Transvaal government; the failure of Jameson's precipitate raid in support of this movement (27 Dec. 1895) seriously involved Rhodes; inquiries by both the Cape Parliament and the British House of Commons, pronounced Rhodes guilty of grave breaches of duty; resigning office of premier (6 Jan. 1896) and for a time the directorship of the Chartered Company, which he resumed in 1898, he devoted himself to the development of Rhodesia; through his personal influence with the chiefs he effected a permanent peace with the Matabeles after a new outbreak, 1896; and he greatly extended railway and telegraph communication. He was made hon. D.C.L. Oxford, 1899, in spite of some protests. On outbreak of South African war he moved to Kimberley and was besieged there (15 Oct. 1899–16 Feb. 1900); next year he spent much time in Europe, returning to the Cape in Feb. 1902. He died after long suffering from heart disease on 26 March at the village of Muizenburg, being buried among the Matoppo Hills; by his will he left some 6,000,000*l.* to the public service, endowing some 170 scholarships at Oxford for students from the colonies, the United States, and Germany; 100,000*l.* was left to his old college, Oriel; sculptured memorials are at Buluwayo, Grahamstown, Capetown, Kimberley, and on the Groote Schuur slopes of Table Mountain outside Capetown; an unfinished portrait by Watts is in the National Portrait Gallery.

SPENCER, HERBERT (1820–1903), philosopher; educated at day school at Derby, his native place, and from 1833 to 1836 mainly at Hinton Charterhouse near Bath under his uncle Thomas Spencer [q. v.]; made little progress in the classics, but was much interested in natural science; after acting as assistant schoolmaster at Derby (1837) he was employed as engineer on Birmingham and Gloucester Railway, 1837–41; wrote letters to 'The Nonconformist' urging limitation of the functions of the state, 1842, which he republished as 'The Proper Sphere of Government,' 1843; sub-editor of the 'Pilot,' the organ of the 'Complete Suffrage Movement,' published at Birmingham, 1844; occupied himself anew with engineering, 1844–6; experimented with mechanical inventions, 1846–7, subsequently inventing an invalid bed, 1866; sub-editor of the 'Economist' in London, 1848–53; visited house of John Chapman, the advanced publisher, 1849; there came to know George Eliot; made acquaintance of Huxley and Tyndall; published 'Social Statics,' 1851, advocating an extreme individualism; contributed articles to the 'Leader,' 'Westminster Review,' and other periodicals, collecting many of these in 'Essays,' 1st ser. 1857, 2nd ser. 1863, 3rd ser. 1864; published 'Principles of Psychology,' 1855 (recast in two vols. 1870–2); during the writing of this book his health gave way, and was never fully restored. During 1858 he planned a system of synthetic philosophy, covering metaphysics, biology, psychology, sociology, and ethics, for publication of which he in 1860 invited subscriptions both in England and America, but this plan, which was for a time successful, broke down about 1865; the deaths of his uncle William and his father in 1866 improved his financial position. In 1861 he issued 'Education,' a treatise aiming at a natural development of the child's intelligence, which became a leading textbook. He published 'First Principles' of his synthetic philosophy, 1862, and 'Principles of Biology,' vol. i. 1864, vol. ii. 1867; joined Jamaica committee for prosecution of Governor Eyre [q. v.], 1866; was elected to Athenaeum Club by the committee, 1868; was offered in 1871 lord rectorship of St. Andrews University, but declined this, and all later offers of honours; in order to deal with the principles of sociology he employed assistants to collect systematically large masses of facts, of which eight volumes under general title of 'Descriptive Sociology' were issued by 1881, while additional volumes appeared after Spencer's death. He contributed his widely read 'Study of Sociology,' 1873, to 'International Scientific Series,' edited by his American friend, Prof. E. L. Youmans; issued 'Principles of Sociology,' vol. i. 1876, vol. ii. 1882, vol. iii. 1896; meanwhile wrote 'Data of Ethics' (1879), forming part i. of the 'Principles of Ethics' (vol. i. 1892, vol. ii. 1893); formed with Mr. Frederic Harrison and Mr. John Morley and others an anti-aggression league, 1882; visited America, 1882; collected four articles from 'Contemporary Review' to form 'The Man versus the State,' 1884, in which he urged anew the limitation of state functions; attacked the positivist religion in 'The Nature and Reality of Religion,' 1885 (suppressed by Spencer, but re-issued without his knowledge as 'The Insuppressible Book'); completed his 'Synthetic Philosophy' in vol. iii. of the 'Principles of Sociology,' 1896; allowed his portrait to be painted by Sir Hubert von Herkomer for presentation to the Scottish National Portrait Gallery, Edinburgh, 1896; issued 'Various Fragments,' 1897, and 'Facts and Comments,' 1902; died, 8 Dec. 1903, after much suffering from shattered nervous system, at Brighton, where he had lived since 1898; he was cremated at Golders Green, his ashes being buried in Highgate Cemetery; left bulk of property in trust for carrying on his 'Descriptive Sociology.' The central doctrines of his philosophy, which exerted an immense influence on his era throughout Europe and America, India and Japan, were on its social side individualism and opposition to war, and on its scientific side evolution and explanation of phenomena from the materialistic standpoint; 'Autobiography' published 1904; 'Life and Letters' by D. Duncan, 1908; an epitome of the 'Synthetic Philosophy' by F. Howard Collins, 5th edit. 1901.
